The so-called "June Meetings."

"The falling away came in with the struggle have preaching; and so the preaching lost convincing power."

Such was the explanation lately given when e was asked why his surrounding community d ceased to flock to what was once hailed as e "June Meeting of the Quakers."

Some of the journals of travelling Friends cord these great meetings, which were gath- ed, especially that at Dartmouth, from the rrounding country on the First-day following e Yearly Meeting held on Rhode Island, as tended by a thousand or more, and being vored with remarkable life and power.

About the time of the modern change in the ture of the ministry, these meetings began wane. Although the neighbors said: "Don't appoint us of having good preaching at the ne Meeting." The very attempt to accommo- te them drove them away. There was, we e informed, an anxiety to secure the "star eachers" who had been conspicuous in the early Meeting week, and this resulted in dis- urses which in a human aim to draw, served entually to scatter. The community were ick to recognize the change of savor,—so arly approaching that which they were ac- stomed to hear from pulpits, that they had ly to stay at their home-meetings to get eaching that was on the same level as that ard in the "June meetings." Therefore they aid where they could get equal good language, ual educated talent, equal fervor and elo- ence, equal Bible expositions—if gospel min- ry was to be these. They missed in the advanced" preaching a peculiar quality, an pointed power though in unlettered men, the ain force of convicting and redeeming grace, for which the new expedients and modes could supply no gathering substitute.

The same loss of power to draw in the outside community when an appointed meeting has been announced, appears now generally in these same regions, in houses formerly thronged at short notice. Confidence seems at a much lower ebb in Friends, though increasingly "able" as speakers, as having any special message, food, or power that is not offered elsewhere.

Our one remedy is in a return to the exclusive ministration of the Spirit in all worship and living.

Friends' Weddings.

Probably in no other thing is the testimony of our religious Society to the single mediatorship of Christ between God and men made more distinct before a witnessing assembly, than in our mode of solemnizing a marriage. A covenant performed "in the presence of the Lord" as the one Mediator, "and of this assembly" as legal witnesses to satisfy the law of the State, has an authorized and ample confirmation, to which the intervention of other priesthoods than that of the great High Priest of our profession can make no addition. They are indeed an intrusion, and a usurpation of the prerogative of the true Mediator of every covenant that is made (as a true marriage must be) between God and the contracting parties. "What God hath joined together" is a union exclusively of his, and not man's, performance. Man cannot confirm it, in its Divine relation, but it is man that can "put asunder," when out of that relation.

Thus the Society of Friends stands almost, if not quite, alone among all Protestant bodies, as being consistently Protestant—if Protestantism means emancipation from the sacerdotal system and principle. Others generally recognize and employ in their pastors a priesthood for ratifying the covenant of marriage, to say nothing of what is called "Christian burial," and "the sacraments." These recognize a priestly office in the pastor. But our view of all those ordinances being spiritual allows our holy Mediator the sole conducting of them. In all Divine relations its words are: "Let nothing stand between your souls and God but Christ." This principle seems made very practical in a Friends' wedding. May it never be encroached upon or stultified in the least by aping of those modes which covet a priesthood, or an elaborate ceremony which hugs close to its ways.

As an illustration of where a little deviation —whether in simplicity or in ceremonial will bring us to, we quote from an Eastern daily paper as follows, omitting names and matter irrelevant to the principles involved:

Rather out of the ordinary weddings was that which was solemnized at the Friends' chapel, on Wednesday evening. The cozy chapel was filled with the relatives and friends of the contracting couple, and the platform was beautifully decorated for the occasion with flowering plants, ferns and palms. Just after eight o'clock the strains of the wedding march filled the chapel, Misses —— and —— playing the music on the organ and violin. The procession entered in the following order: [the minister and his wife, the bride, etc.] At the close of the march, prayer was offered by [the minister]. The bride and groom then arose and after saying a few words the wedding ring was placed on the finger of the bride, the sealing kiss was pressed on her lips. Then the certificate was signed by the contracting parties."

We do not note the above incident as clearly an instance of sacerdotalism, so much as of other tendencies—which will speak for themselves.

THE FUNERAL MARCH.—We take the opportunity to express a burden felt on several occasions when we have seen wedding companies, on coming up the long aisle of our meeting-houses, adopt a slow, funeral march painful to behold. The one explanation which we have heard invariably given by spectators is, that it is in order to afford time to be seen.

Spectacular effect really wins so little esteem among beholders, that we wonder it can be indulged as a motive by those who are studious of a commendable occasion.

Display is one of the dangers and temptations of our public mode of marriage. For all that, if we should drop our present public mode, we should drop a most telling testimony for the one Mediator of a Divine covenant. We should dispense with perhaps our most effective opportunity of testifying unto the Truth as we hold it, and before strangers who would never otherwise have attended our meetings for worship. If the spirit of ostentation could be eradicated from the human heart by a private ceremony, this would be worth considering. But as we can have no hope that it would, we cherish the public testimony as a service too valuable to be set aside.

No man can be provident of his time who is not prudent in the choice of his company.—Jeremy Taylor.

For "The Friend."

Consumers' Leagues.

One of the principles that has been strongly emphasized by the Society of Friends is that of the responsibility of the individual for every act that he encourages.

To revive this principle in our minds, let us note some illustrations of it: If we buy goods of an objectionable character, we encourage the making of goods of that sort. If we buy at an hour or on a day when the store ought to be closed, we are responsible for its being open. If we believe that the first day of the week should be observed as a day of rest, we are disregarding our principle if we do things that involve the labor of others on that day. We may hold different views about all these questions—as to how goods ought or ought not to be made or sold, as to what hours or days stores ought to be open, as to how much work ought to be done on the First day of the week; but whatever views we hold, we cannot escape the fact that we are responsible for the making and selling of the goods we buy, for the hours kept by the stores, for all work that we demand, all acts that we encourage.

John Woolman furnishes a most beautiful example of one who kept his hands clean from what seemed to him evil. He would not wear dyed clothing because the dyeing seemed to him to be associated with physical and moral evil. He would not drink from a silver vessel, because he thought it the fruit of oppression. He had his letters sent privately, because the post abused its workers. However our opinions may differ as to dyed clothes or silver vessels, we can but acknowledge that we must be pure as John Woolman in motive and act in order to reach perfect righteousness.

The number of people who feel a responsibility for the making and selling of goods they use seems to be appallingly small. I had a thoughtful friend who argued that she might as well wear egret plumes, even though the capture of the egret is cruel. There would, she said, be no less egrets killed if she didn't wear their feathers. We hear like arguments as to using clothing made under oppressive conditions. Will our action make any difference? We do not know to a surety. One thing, however, we do know: Our acts should be free from any connection with evil. We want goods that are morally clean, that are free from the taint of cruelty and oppression.

In our modern complex life it is difficult to know what is and what is not connected with oppression. To help educate public sentiment in the matter, the Consumers' Leagues have arisen. I should like to quote just here the words of a successful worker:*

"The great difficulty that has presented itself to conscientious individuals who desired not to take part in the oppression of their fellowmen by buying goods made and sold under inhuman conditions has always been that of learning what those conditions were. It was easy enough for the abolitionists to give up the use of sugar and cotton, because these were known to be 'slave-made,' but the conditions of so-called 'free labor' are more complicated, and in order to learn where and how the goods they desire to purchase are made, it is necessary to have concerted action, and from this necessity was developed the idea of 'The Consumers' League.'"

But the Consumers' Leagues have a larger purpose than merely enabling one to keep one's own conduct clean. They aim to improve the condition of workers in stores and makers of garments. The buyer has it in his power not only to abstain from evil, but positively to help the condition of workers.

The first Consumers' League was established in London in 1890. The first one in this country was that of New York, organized in 1891.* The principles of the New York league are stated as follows:

"(1) That the interests of the community demands that all workers should receive, not the lowest wages, but fair living wages.

"(2) That the responsibility for some of the worst evils from which wage earners suffer rests with the consumers, who persist buying in the cheapest market, regardless of how cheapness is brought about.

"(3) That it is therefore the duty of consumers to find out under what conditions the articles which they purchase are produced, and to insist that these conditions shall be at least decent, and consistent with a respectable existence on the part of the workers.

"(4) That this duty is especially incumbent upon consumers in relation to the products of women's work, since there is no point beyond which the wages of women may not be pressed down, unless artificially maintained at a living rate by combinations, either of the workers themselves or of consumers."

The league has kept a list of stores that conform to the "Standard of a Fair House." This is called the "White List." In 1891 there were but eight stores of New York which they found they could put on their list. But since that time, the management of the stores has so improved that in 1898 there were forty names on the "White List." The members of the league have made repeated visits to merchants, endeavoring to induce them to conform to Fair Standards, and consulting with them in a friendly way. They have at the same time endeavored to educate the buyers to a sense of their responsibilities. The league has directed its attention especially toward securing compensation of the employees for "over-time;" and toward providing seats for women employees. Although there was already in existence a law demanding seats for women in stores, they found that the law was in one way or another evaded by many merchants. They sought for several years and finally gained the passage of a Mercantile Inspection Act, which protects young persons working in shops.

Consumers' Leagues are at work in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Chicago and Boston. "The Consumers' League of Pennsylvania" with headquarters at Philadelphia,† was organized in 1897. It has now over a thousand members. It states "the chief points in the conditions of a Fair House" to be:

"A ten-hour working day;
Vacation with pay;
Compensation for overtime;
Conformation to present sanitary laws;
Seats for female employees and permissi to use them;
Fines paid into an employee benefit fun

There are many stores in Philadelphia and other cities that do not come up to this standard; there are others that are far above Annie M. MacLean, a student of the Univers of Chicago, spent during the holiday trade t weeks as saleswoman in two large Chica stores in which the conditions were known be below the standard.* In one of the stores seats were provided; saleswomen had to sta all day, except during the intermissions lunch and supper. The day during the holid trade extended from 8 A. M. to 10 P. M., a the exhaustion of some of the girls was piti and very injurious. She found many other moralizing influences that could easily ha been avoided by a decently humane manag ment. Her experience represents the low grade Chicago stores; there are others whe the employees are treated better than the Consumers' League demands.

While the work of the Consumers' Leagu has been directed in the first place toward taining better conditions for workers in stor they have also investigated the making of g ments outside of stores. Here the task is mo difficult. The New York league has extend its work in this direction; and the Pennsylvan league encourages its members to choose g ments made in factories and not in sweat sho

The chief work of Consumers' Leagues is t education of the shoppers. If merchants fi that the shoppers are interested in the mo character of the stores, they will hasten bring them up to the standards the buyer d mands. E. LAETITIA MOON.

Leaving State affairs, let us return to George x, who, in the year 1649, was much exer-ed to declare openly against all sorts of sins. ing on a First-day of the week, with some of friends to Nottingham, to have a meeting ere, having seen from the top of a hill the eat steeple house of the town, he felt it re-ired of him to cry against that idol temple, d the worshippers therein, etc. . . . . e officers came and took him away (from that eeple house) and put him in a nasty, stinking ison. But some time after the head sheriff, hn Reckless, sent for him to his house, and en G. F. came in, the sheriff's wife met him the hall, and taking him by the hand said, Salvation is come to our house"—his speech the steeple house had amazed many, and not ly this woman was wrought upon, but also r husband, children and servants were much anged by the power of the Lord.

G. F. thus coming to lodge at this sheriff's use, had great meetings there, and some per-ns of quality in the world came to them, and ey were reached very eminently by an invisi-e power. A mighty change was now wrought Reckless, and as he was walking with G. F. his chamber said, "I must go into the mar-t, and preach repentance to the people," and cordingly he went into several streets preach-g repentance. G. F. was carried back to ison. In the meanwhile such a wonderful wer broke forth among his friends that many ere astonished at it, so that even several of e priests were made tender, and some did nfess to the power of the Lord. G. F. hav-g been kept a prisoner a pretty long time, is at length set at liberty, and then travelled before in the work of the Lord.

At Mansfield-Woodhouse he was cruelly beat- and bruised with hands, bibles and sticks: en haled out, though hardly able to stand, d put into the stocks, etc. After being set liberty the rude multitude stoned him out of e town, and though he was scarce able to go, pleased the Lord to heal him again, etc.

Out of Nottinghamshire, he went into Lei-stershire accompanied by several of his iends. At Barrow they discoursed with some ptists, and asked them who baptized John e Baptist and Peter, John and the rest of the postles, etc.

At Bagworth they went to a steeple house; d after the priest had done, they had some rvice there by speaking to the people. At ventry he met with some ranters, and re-oved them for their blasphemous expressions. Atherstone, going into the chapel, he de-ired to the priests and the people, that God is come to teach his people himself, and to ing them off from all their man-made teach-s, etc.

At Market-Bosworth, the people being rred up by the priest, Nathaniel Stevens, ll upon G. F. and his friends, and stoned em out of the town. Nevertheless, this ought on the minds of some others, so that ey were made loving. At Twy-Cross was a eat man who had long lain sick, and given er by the physicians; G. F. was moved to ay by his bed-side; and the Lord was en-eated, so that the sick man was restored to alth.

After this he went into Derbyshire, where his fellow believers increased in Godly strength; coming to Chesterfield, they had him before the Mayor, . . . when it was late in the night the officers and watchmen led him out of the town. At Derby, in the year 1650, he spoke to a congregation of officers of the army, priests and preachers, and they were pretty quiet; but there came an officer who took him by the hand and said, that he and the other two that were with him, must go before the magistrates, and they committed him and another man to the house of correction in Derby for six months, as blasphemers.

Gervas Bennet, one of the justices of the peace who signed the mittimus dated 10-30-1650, when they were sent to the house of correction, (an Independent) hearing that G. F. bade him, and those about him tremble at the word of the Lord! took hold of this weighty saying with such an airy mind, that from thence he took occasion to call him and his friends scornfully, Quakers.

This new denomination spread so among the people that not only the priests there from that time, gave no other name to the Professors of the Light, but sounded it abroad. . . . They have been called every where by that English names which sounding very odd in the ears of some foreign nations, hath also given occasion to many silly stories. . . . What wonder if some being struck with the terrors of God did tremble? But this being seen by envious men, they took occasion from thence to tell that these Professors of the Light performed their worship with shaking, yet they themselves never asserted that trembling of the body was an essential part of their religion, but have occasionally said the contrary; though they did not deny themselves to be such as tremble before God. G. F. wrote while a prisoner at Derby to the priests at Derby, to the Magistrates and Justices who had committed him, to the Mayor of Derby, and to those of the Court and a few lines to the bell-ringers of the steeple-house, called St. Peters, in Derby. Several of the professors came to discourse with him, etc. . . . The keeper of the prison, who was also a high professor, was much enraged against G. F. and spoke wickedly of him. But it pleased the Lord one day to strike him so, that he was under great anguish of mind, and said to his wife, "I have seen the day of judgment, and I saw George there and was afraid of him, because I had done him so much wrong, and spoken so much against him." Towards evening the keeper came up into his chamber and said to him, "I have been as a lion against you; but now I come like a lamb, and like the jailer that came to Paul and Silas trembling," etc. In this year Elizabeth Hooten also felt herself moved publicly to preach the way of salvation to others, being the first woman preacher by what I am informed, among those that began now generally to be called by the name of Quakers. Yet I have found in History of the Troubles in England, printed in the year 1647, that among other persuasions at London there were also women that did preach in large meetings, and were heard by many with great satisfaction.

1651—G. F's commitment being very near out and there being many new soldiers raised, the commissioners would have made him captain over them, and the soldiers cried, "They would have none but him." G. F. told them in the market place, where they proffered him that preferment, (as they called it.) "That he could not do so, well knowing from whence all wars do arise, and that he lived in the virtue of that life and power that took away the occasion of all wars." . . . And said "If this be your love and kindness I trample it under my feet," which so enraged them that they said, "Take him away, jailer, and put him into the dungeon amongst the rogues and felons." Thus G. F. was put into a lousy, stinking place, amongst thirty felons, where he had no bed, and was kept almost half a year—at times he was suffered to walk in the garden. His relations and others came to see him, etc., and had some interesting interviews.

[He wrote to the magistrates and justices again, also to his friends, and a lamentation about Derby.]

At length they turned him out of jail, about the beginning of the winter, 1651, after he had been imprisoned about a year. Being set at liberty he went into Leicestershire and Nottinghamshire, and from thence into Derbyshire and Yorkshire. In Doncaster and other places he preached repentance. Afterwards at Balby Richard Farnsworth and several others were convinced. Coming near Wakefield James Naylor came to him, and also acknowledged the truth of that doctrine he held forth, likewise William Dewsbury, who was one of those who had been immediately convinced as G. F. was himself, and found himself in unity with him. Of these was also George Fox, the younger.

PUSH THE BUTTON.—"Have you pushed the button?" was the query made of a young man waiting for the elevator to descend.

"No; I don't believe I did," was the reply.

Thereupon he pushed it. Instantly the lever in the cab on the top floor was reversed and in a moment the door was opened. We all entered the cab and in a short moment were at our destination. The fire of meditation burned, and we mused and said:

1. His thoughtlessness kept several of us standing in the cold, besides wasting golden moments. So, too, many of us, because we are careless and thoughtless, keep others from the blessings and privileges they might enjoy.

2. We often are kept outside of the Kingdom because we do not do our part. Faith must be the act of the individual. We must lay hold and then God meets us in Christ.

3. God is more willing, yea, infinitely, to answer our touch and descend to lift us up than man. But we must press the button—must be in communication with him.

4. Thus working together with him, we enter through the door, Christ, and are lifted by his marvellous power above the damp places and cold winds and smoky atmosphere into his eternal sunshine.

5. To lift us up the elevator came down. Our blessed Lord humbled himself and came down (and what a descent from Glory to the grave!) that He might lift us up.

6. Reader, be not disappointed that you remain on the "ground floor," if you have not pushed the button. Oh, push the button! and countless blessings shall come to you and to others through you.—Baptist Union.

The Dukhobors of the Year 1815.

[The following extract has been forwarded to us as found in the Religious Remembrancer, a weekly publication printed in Philadelphia in 1815. It is interesting as showing the belief of the Dukhobortsi at that time, and instructive as an illustration that spiritual knowledge may be communicated to illiterate men. The admission that this people then served in the army, shows, as in the case of Friends' gradual disowning of keeping slaves, that all pointings of Truth are not appreciated by a people at once].

Petersburg, Sept. 28th, 1815.

In a short tour from Petersburg, we fell in with a colony of Cossacks, consisting of about ninety persons, who are in these quarters for the word of God, and the testimony of Jesus Christ. They belong originally to the Don, and are of the sect of Duhabertzy*, of whom you will find some particulars in Pinkerton's Greek Church. Since they came to Finland, they have had no books among them, not even a single copy of the Scriptures. We had a long conversation with one of them, who could not read, and yet he answered all our questions in the language of Scripture. We asked if they had any priests among them ? He answered, "Yes, we have a great High Priest, who is holy, harmless," &c. Have you baptism ? We are baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire." Have you communion ? "We have communion with the Lord Jesus daily." Have you churches? "I hope you do not think that churches are built of wood and stone ; wherever two or three are met together in Christ's name, there He has promised to be with them ; and there is a Church of Christ. We have now conversed about God for more than an hour, and are of one heart and one soul, we are a church when you will. With the so-called churches we can have nothing to do, as they admit drunkards, etc., but a church of Christ is holy, and all its members must be so too. You will find no such people among us." What is your opinion of the new birth (reading to him the passage of John III), "We are born the first time when we are born of our mother, but the second time when our hearts are changed by the word and spirit of God, when we are led to hate what we loved, and love what we hated formerly, when we give over living in sin ; not that we are perfect in this world, but we have no pleasure in sin as before." What do you think is meant by being born of water and of the Spirit ? "By water is not meant baptism, but the word of God; for we are born of the incorruptible seed of the word which liveth and abideth for ever ; and as it is the Spirit by whose operation this is effected, so we are said to be born of the Spirit ; that which is born of the flesh is flesh ; so you see we are not Christians or born again as we come into the world, we do not inherit it from our parents." But seeing you cannot read, how came you to know all this ? "I wonder you ask such a question. Has not Jesus promised to be with his people always, to the end of the world : and has He not promised to give them his Spirit to teach them all things? He has said, when you are brought before governors and kings for my sake, take no thought how or what you shall speak, for it shall be given you in the same hour what you shall speak ; now I believe the promise. I have often been called to answer for my religion, and I have always found Jesus true to his word. And there now, when called to come before you. I prayed God to fulfil this promise to me, and He has done it. You see I speak freely, and you seem satisfied with me. You are the first we have ever met with in this place who understood us. You must be taught by the same spirit." Can any among you read? "There are some among us who can read; but you seem to lay much stress on reading and being learned; Jesus Christ had no other learning than his parents taught Him, and the apostles were unlearned men. It is enough if we are taught of the spirit." We asked him if he crossed himself before these pictures ? he replied, "That we cannot do ; you know the commandments ;" and here he repeated the first and second. Are you obedient to the laws? "As far as they do not interfere with our religion or our faith. We have sworn allegiance to our Emperor, and we serve in the army." You are called Duhabertzy "Our gracious Emperor has been pleased to call us so, and we submit. We call ourselves true Christians ; we are the same as from the beginning." Are there many on the Don of your way of thinking ? "O yes, many thousands; but they are afraid to show themselves, or to avow their opinions." Have you been persecuted? "If any man will live godly in Christ Jesus he must suffer persecution." We then related to him what was going on in the religious world, and made him acquainted with the Bible Society.

I wish you had been present while we related these things to him. He seemed to awaken as out of a dream ; a heavenly joy beamed from his countenance, which melted our hearts. At last he exclaimed, "Now he is near. We have long been expecting him to come, and long been convinced it could not be far distant, but never believed that such preparations were making for his coming. No person has ever told us of these things. I will go home to my church and relate to them all these glorious things. How will my brethren rejoice when they hear them." We gave him a Russian Testament, and some of our Society's publications to carry home with him to his brethren, as he always called them. It seems they have all things common or nearly so. Their conduct is most exemplary : they have a good report of all men, even of their enemies.

The following is from Pinkerton's Account of this people, referred to in the preceding note.

"From among the common peasants, who are in general not only illiterate, but strongly attached to the external ceremonies of religion, there sprung up all at once a sect, in the middle of the last century, that not only threw aside all the ceremonies and rites of the Greek Church, but who also rejected baptism and the Lord's supper.

"A sect of this description could not long remain unnoticed, or be secure from molestation, both by their neighbors and by government, especially as both were unacquainted with their principles. Accordingly they suffered from all quarters continued persecution, being continually exposed to reproach, and not unfrequently to imprisonment. In their intercourse with their neighbors, they endured the most abusive language, and other insults; and all were ready to construe every action of their lives in such a way, as to point them out the disturbers of the public peace, and as the off scouring of society.

"The higher departments of governme judged of them according to the reports of th lower departments; and hence many of the were sent into exile, as if they had been the wor of criminals. In this manner the persecuti of the Duhobortsi continued, with few inte missions, until the reign of the humane a peaceable Alexander I.

"The Duhobortsi, till of late, had been ve much scattered in different parts of the empir seldom could as many of them be found in o place as to form a separate village. But, e clusive of those in the southern provinces, th are dispersed throughout the government Caucasus, Donkozaks, and Archangel; in La land, and even in Irkutsk, and Kamtschatka.

"They say also that there are many of the members in Germany and Turkey : but th they are more persecuted in Germany tha even among the Mohammedans."

*Spelt Duhobortsi by Pinkerton in his Appendix to the Present State of the Greek Church in Russia, p. 248, New York edition.

Japanese Politeness.—The Japanese, fro the highest officials to the humblest peasant from the most aged to the boys and girls a little children, manifest such a studied polit ness that they invariably and unconscious elicit favorable remarks from all who vis Japan, and the casual observer concludes th it is innate. The courtly demeanor of th people is held in very high esteem among themselves. It has been taught for centuri by church and state, until it has become natural to them as breathing.

The fundamental tenets of their religi teach true politeness as one of the highest vi tures; and reverence to parents, deference old age, and courtesy to all strangers are co sidered as essential characteristics to a su cessful career in business, and of acceptab worship before their gods.

The respect paid to parents does not cea when the children are mature men and wome but it is considered a privilege as well as a fili duty to study the wants and wishes of paren to the last hour of earthly existence. The san disposition that is manifested by the childr to their parents is exhibited by the parents their children. The babies and children a not scolded or punished, and the parents wh would beat a child would be shunned as a mo ster. The children of the household, likewis are remarkable for their courtesy to one anothe It is evident that the family circle fosters th germs of the great national trait of ceremoni politeness, and this excellent virtue should b practised from the heart universally, especia ly by Christian nations, church organization and family circles.—The Watchword.

Lord, my voice by nature is harsh and u tunable, and it is vain to lavish my art to bett it. Can my singing of psalms be pleasing Thy ears, which is unpleasing to my own? Ye though I can not chant with the nightingale chirp with the blackbird, I had rather chatte with the swallow, yea, rather croak with th raven, than be altogether silent. Hadst Th given me a better voice I would have praise Thee with a better voice.—Thomas Fuller.

SELECTED.

AN OLD POEM.

"How big was Alexander, pa,
That people call him GREAT?
Was he like old Goliah tall—
His spear a hundred weight?

"Was he so large that he could stand
Like some tall steeple high;
And, while his feet were on the ground,
His hands could touch the sky?"

"Oh, no, my child; about as large As I, or uncle James.
'Twas not his stature made him great;
But greatness of his name."

"His name so great? I know 'tis long,
But easy quite to spell,—
And more than half a year ago
I knew it very well."

"I mean, my child, his actions were
So great, he got a name
That everybody speaks with praise,
And tells about his fame."

"Well what great actions did he do?
I want to know it all."
"Why, he it was that conquered Tyre,
And levelled down her wall;

"And thousands of her people slew—
And then to Persia went—
And fire and sword, on every side,
Through many a region sent.

"A hundred conquered cities shone
With midnight burnings red;
And, strewed o'er many a battle ground,
A thousand soldiers bled."

"Did killing people make him great?
Then why was Abel Young,
Who killed his neighbor training day,
Put into jail, and hung?

"I never heard them call him great."
"Ah! that was not in war;
And him that kills a single man,
His neighbors all abhor.

"Well, then, if I should kill one man,
I'd kill a hundred more;—
I should be great, and not get hung Like Abel Young before."

"Not so, my child, 'twill never do;
The gospel bids be kind."
"Then they that kill, and they that praise
The gospel do not mind."

"You know, my child, the Bible says
That you must always do
To other people, as you wish To have them do to you."

"But, pa, did Alexander wish
That some strong man would come
And burn his house, and kill him too;
And do as he had done?

"And everybody called him great
For killing people so!
Well, now, what right he had to kill,
I should be glad to know.

"If any one should burn the buildings here,
And kill the folks within,
Would anybody call him great,
For such a wicked thing?"

THE DEVIL'S MISSIONARY WORK.—The American Issue quotes from the note-book of one who was present at a meeting of the Ohio Liquor League some years ago, these words from an officer of the league who, when discussing and citing the conditions of success in the trade, remarked:

'It will appear from these facts, gentlemen, that the success of our business is dependent largely upon the creation of appetite for drink. Men who drink liquor, like others, will die, and if there is no new appetite created, our counters will be empty, as will our coffers. Our children will go hungry, or we must change our business to that of some other more remunerative.

"The open field for the creation of this appetite is among the boys. After men are grown and their habits are formed, they rarely ever change in this regard. It will be needful, therefore, that missionary work be done among the boys and I make the suggestion, gentlemen, that nickels expended in treats to the boys now, will return in dollars to your tills after the appetite has been formed. Above all things create appetite!"

This is the kind of "missionary work" done by the 55,807 bartenders and 71,412 saloonkeepers who act as satan's missionaries in the dram-shops of this country. Could satan himself show greater and more malignant craft? What are you doing to hinder it?

NANTUCKET, MASS., 1897.

Believing that the memory of the righteous is well pleasing with Him with whom we have to do, we have felt inclined to hold in remembrance the bright example of one the Lord has been pleased to deprive us of, one who was a living minister, qualified and sustained by the influence of his holy Spirit, and whose lively concern and labors of love are still fresh in our minds.

Narcissa B. Coffin was born in Starksboro, Vt., the twenty-eighth of Ninth Month, 1817. She was the daughter of Ezra and Hannah Battey and resided with her parents till about the eighteenth year of her age. Although possessed naturally of an animated and cheerful disposition, she was of a thoughtful and serious turn of mind and was exemplary in her conduct and conversation, early yielding obedience to the pointings and requirements of apprehended duty.

When about eighteen years of age she accompanied her mother, who was a minister in good standing in the Society of Friends, on a religious visit to what was called the Black River Country, visiting numerous meetings in the eastern part of the State of New York. Not long after this event, she left her native State to reside in New Bedford, Mass., where for a number of years, she taught school.

The remarkable vision of her grandfather, Joseph Hoag, so much of which has already been fulfilled, was taken in writing by her in early life at his request, saying, as he pointed his finger at her, "I want that child to be my scribe." She had never heard of it until he unfolded it to her on this occasion. When he had apparently finished, she read it over to him and asked him if it was satisfactory. He made no immediate response, but sat in solid silence for some time, then said, "Yes, that is right, and I now feel easy."

On the first of Ninth Month, 1849, she was married to Alexander G. Coffin of Nantucket, Mass., where she afterwards resided till the close of her life.

In the latter part of the year 1858 she became a recorded minister among Friends, and in the Fifth Month, 1860, by the consent and approval of her meeting, she paid a religious visit to the meetings composing New England Yearly Meeting, which was accomplished to the peace of her own mind and the encouragement of the meetings visited. In the Twelfth Month of the same year she was again liberated to attend Salem and Dover Quarter of that Yearly Meeting and to appoint some meetings within its limits. This visit, although performed in "great weakness" was also a satisfaction to those among whom she labored.

Besides her great concern for her brethren and sisters in the Truth, and the people at large, she was particularly called by Him whom her soul loved best to visit the poor outcasts of society confined in prison houses, and many a grated cell was unbolted for her to bear to the lone inmates the glad gospel tidings of "peace on earth and good will to men," and hearts which appeared to be hardened in sin and transgression were often melted into tears of true contrition by her tender and persuasive admonitions.

She was possessed of a natural gift of language, which, coupled with her love for the whole human family, rendered it particularly necessary for her to keep close to her Guide, and her apprehended departures at times caused her much suffering, in the midst of which she was oft heard to say, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." But, through faith in her Lord and Master, she was brought through deep provings and baptisms and came forth clear and bright as "gold tried in the fire."

In the Second Month, 1890, she was liberated by her Monthly Meeting to visit in gospel love some meetings in New England, and to appoint some among those not members of our Society, and in the Eighth Month of the same year she visited, with the approval of her friends, the meetings and families composing New York Yearly Meeting, and also visited those of the General Meeting of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, etc. [She also had other service while in these parts]. In the Fifth Month, 1891, she was left at liberty to pursue a concern, which had long rested with her, to visit Friends in Great Britain and Ireland, as well as the little companies professing with Friends in Norway and elsewhere. All these late concerns were prosecuted under great physical weakness, but her labors were signally favored and many were made to rejoice at her coming, and she returned home with the sweet reward of peace.

In writing to a friend relative to the prospect of her European journey she says, "I have felt very quiet and easy since my return (from the Monthly Meeting), sometimes [experiencing] for hours together an inexpressible sweetness, with the assurance that the journey was required of me, and many, many times, 'Fear not' pressingly added, but have been favored to leave it to Him whose cause it is, and I could appeal to Him that it was to please Him I had given up to it in weakness, fearfulness and trembling. It seems so nice to just sit in peaceful communion with the dear Master and no burden resting on my shoulders. I also know, if I will not take it, neither peace nor that communion which is so precious will be either here or hereafter. So I will bow and take the cup, whatever its waters prove, in the full faith that all the clouds He permits to rise are big with mercy, and nothing will prevent them from breaking in blessings on my head but my own shortcomings."

At a Monthly Meeting at Nantucket in the Sixth Month, 1892, she had a striking communication, a part of which was afterwards transcribed from memory as follows : "I feel that I have a message of Gospel love to the younger members of this meeting. My exercises have been great for them. I have yearned for them with exceeding great yearning as I stand with my feet upon the brink of the grave, that there may be a deepening in the root of life and a greater growth in grace and the saving knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Keep back no part of the price of the land but make a full surrender to be led and guided by the Master. Oh, do not have any longings for the flesh pots of Egypt, its onions and garlics, nor have any desire to return, for its idols are there and you will be left to worship them. The Father loves you with an exceeding great love, and upon your shoulders will soon rest the burden of society, and oh that you may be kept under the Father's wing !"

At the last Monthly Meeting that she attended, which was held in her room on the twenty-seventh of Tenth Month, 1892, she was lively in testimony which seemed to correspond well with the tenor of her life, and showed her continued exercise for her friends who were soon to be left behind. From her communication on this occasion the following extracts were taken :

"We must dig deep and lay a sure foundation on the immutable Rock to withstand all the storms, trials and temptations of the evil one. This has been an unexpected privilege to me, but the promise was given me 'as thy days so shall thy strength be,' and truly it is so. Oh, what a loving Father we serve if we would only give up implicitly to Him ? And oh, sayeth, my soul, ye that are bowed down and tossed, lift up your heads in hope, for the day of your redemption draweth nigh, wherein ye will be enabled to give praise, high praises, to the Lamb immaculate, who is forever worthy, worthy, worthy, world without end." Though her natural strength failed apace, her concern for the Society did not abate. To one who visited her at this time she said, "Oh, I have yearned day and night for this little company. I want every one of you to be faithful, the stripping and purifying must go on, but oh, be faithful. Give my love to all our dear friends. There is an everlasting Arm stretched out for all those who are willing to lay hold of it. The fault is with those who will not accept."

In the latter part of the year 1892, the infirmity under which she had long been a sufferer, increasing more rapidly upon her, it became evident that her work was nearly accomplished, and it was her privilege to be able to feel a spirit of resignation to the Divine will, and to look forward in a full assurance of entering into the state of blessed immortality promised to the faithful. Near the time of her close, not being able to speak above a whisper, she was heard to say, "A glorious high Sanctuary is our God to his poor children, to protect all that are within it. Be careful, dear ones, not to get outside of the Sanctuary." She soon after took her husband and daughter by the hand and bade them farewell, and in a short time became unconscious and remained so until the close, which occurred on First-day morning, the fourth of Twelfth Month, 1892, when, we doubt not, her purified spirit was admitted into one of the many mansions prepared for the just of all generations, there to join the angelic hosts around the throne of Him whom to serve is life eternal. Her funeral occurred on the following Fourth-day, when her remains were interred in the Friends' burying ground at Nantucket, Mass.

Read and approved by Nantucket Monthly Meeting of Men and Women Friends, held at Lynn, on the twenty-fifth of Third Month, 1897.

WILLIAM T. OLIVER,
Clerk for the day.

He desired his Love to our ancient Friend Elizabeth Richardson, and said he hoped to see her again, meaning in immutability.

To a young man, not of our Society he said, "I am glad to see thee, and am obliged for the trouble thou hast taken, there is something good about thee ; I believe thou art well inclined, but like many others willing to go on in the old beaten track, but when thou feels any of the inward breathings of Truth, or its discoveries, attend thereto, for I know thou hast a sufficiency of it to begin upon in order to make a good ending."

To his sister's Husband he said, "I have loved thee as a Brother, and I know thou art an honest man, and has something good in thee, but there is also something of Shame ; remember if thou does not acknowledge God before Men, He will not acknowledge thee."

After a while his wife being so full that she gave a little vent to her grief, he said, "keep Silence before me, O Islands, and let the People renew their strength."

On seeing a religious, inoffensive man, (one of his Tenants), come into the room, he called out, "Oh John, I am glad to see thee ; there is one," said he, "that has minded the day of small things," and spoke something of the Lord's Goodness to himself and how well it was with him, adding that he thought he was an honest man, and did not doubt but it would be well with him also.

To a Servant of his, he said he hoped he would be faithful to his Mistress, and recommended him and all of his Profession, not to trust to the Priest, or the ringing of a bell to do the work for them, but to seek for themselves ; that whatsoever was to be known of God was made manifest in man, and blessing the Lord, said He had not sent Bishop or Priest to him to touch him or engage his attention, but had come and touched him himself and done the work for him.

On speaking to a Friend about the want of regularity in some of his accounts by which he thought his family would sustain loss, he said it was no wonder that these accounts should be neglected when he had neglected his own great account.

He afterwards uttered many sweet expressions, a few of which, that could be remembered, were as follow :

"It is better to be here tho' in the house of mourning than in the house of rejoycing."

"Oh Lord, as I have found thee, I will not, I intend, let thee go."

"O Beautiful is his Countenance."

"He hath lift up the light of his counten ance on me, and it is beautiful indeed."

On hearing the clock strike six he said h had lived twenty-four hours longer than he ex pected, and that it was the most Glorious, happ day ever he had, and tho' he greatly regrette putting off the work so long, yet rejoiced i the Lord's goodness and hoped in that twenty four hours he was enabled to find acceptance as well as if he had been in the front of th battle ; and exhorted others not to trust t that, but to begin early, that it is a fine thin at such a time to have nothing to do but t die, and that it was the Lord alone that di the work for him.

He was glad to see so many of his Friend and Relations about him, and expressed an ob ligation for their kindness in attending hi and that sure they could have no other motiv for it but Love and that we may be proper called the Family of Love.

At another time acknowledging the kindne of his Friends, he said, "I know it proceed from Love, for there is a tincture of good you. On expressing his great resignation an the quiet frame of his mind, he signified h satisfaction in being in a good degree preserv so since the beginning of his sickness, and th he had not used any angry expressions to tho about him, nor in word or thought murmur at the Great Master.

He lamented the pride and vanity of fooli People, in spending so much time and pains deck their poor bodies, an example of the vil ness of which he thought was in himself, a said, "I believe I am thus strengthened f some good purpose for your sakes, and wi you may attend to the advice of a dying Frier and think of me sometimes that there was su a one ; I am going but a little before you."

To a Friend he said : "A Friend the oth night told me there was good yet in store f me, and I think I know now what it is." the same Friend he said : "I remember th gave me some advice several years ago, whi was good advice, though I did not then thi it so, nor did thou speak it to me as th should have done, yet I have often thought it since and believe it was of use to me."

To his wife he said, "It is a great mer that this was not the sickness or death of day or two, for I was not ready, but since t warning think I was not idle one hour."

"I have been enabled since my sickness give up Wife, Children and all, and set value on them, in comparison of what is bef me."

The Doctor that was sent for having return from the Country when he was informed o (his dependance and expectation being tal off from such helps, and even from the des of life,) he said, "give my love to him, I h no occasion of him now," but on a Relat expressing a desire that the Doctor should him as he was sent for, he consented, and likewise prevailed on to consent to the putt blisters on his legs, which in a short t began to be exceedingly troublesome to h and as it was observed that as at some per of his sickness he seemed to place rather much dependence on the Physicians, it was p mitted that by them he was greatly exerci as the distress occasioned to him by the b ters was very great for two days, and ca a severe conflict, which himself and those at n much lamented, after the fine, easy state mind he had before attained. He said he ought they delayed his passage, and that but them he would have been in his Master's use before ; and often prayed to be enabled hold out to the end and that his Faith may t fail.

When he observed the light appear on Fifth- y morning, he desired to be kept quiet that y, as he must mind his own business, and not let many go to see him lest he should be turbed, or in anything miss the mark.

Being much streightened for breath, he d, "There is none to apply to at such a ne but the Great Master ; it would not do to ply to a Brother or a Sister, they could not p in such a case." He desired his Friends pray for him that he may hold out to the l, and said to a Friend sitting by "pray for ; that my Faith fail not." One or two more ning in, he said, "Oh, my dear Friend, I h you may all grow in Grace." "I hope joyful tidings of salvation are coming to . Is my hour near come ? Is my work done? tiently wait and quietly hope."

Sixth-day evening by his own desire there s some blood taken from him, after which lay more composed, and turning himself, d : "Come, who knows but I may get a little the Great Master's company now before I " and after a while, said, "never fear, never r, I hope all will be well."

He said, the Lord had greatly favored him, ny times when none knew it but himself, ' he had too much neglected it, that he had evidence that the kingdom of Heaven was n to receive him.

That night being very uneasy, he many times yed to the following purpose : "Oh thou st Gracious and merciful God, help me ! O ve me not in the hour of tryal, O my God ! p me, and be with me and grant me Pa- nce."

He had several times expresst a fear of los- his understanding, which Seventh-day even- there appeared some symptoms of, so that seemed to lose nearly all recollection of his ness, yet was wonderfully preserved from offensive language or other irregularities, t morning recollecting himself a little, he some close questions to a Friend who sat with him, to know what ailed him, how long had been sick, &c. Said he believed he lost his senses and desired to know when how, adding, he hoped he had not said any- ng offensive, or if he did he hoped to be for- en, as he could not help it. At times after- rds he complained much of his head, but his voice and senses preserved to the last. said to a Friend a little before his depart- "The sting of Death is Sin, and that is o' the Lord's goodness taken away from "

Third-day afternoon the twenty-second of ond Month, 1785, he quietly departed with composed countenance, aged thirty-three rs, and was interred in Friends' Graveyard 25th of the same, attended by a great num- of People, at which time our Friend Edward ton had a testimony to the Truth.

Curious Trees.

A few miles from Sea Isle City, N. J., on the island of Five-Mile Beach, are to be found about as curious tree growths as there are in this country, says the New York Sun. Nature has been lavish here in the formation of curious trees. The Siamese twins, two monster hollies, grow up to a height of sixty-five feet. About fifteen feet from the ground years ago, a branch nearly a foot in diameter grew out from one of the trees and in some unknown manner forced its way through the trunk of the adjoining tree, thus solidly joining the two trees together. These trees are of the same thickness and height, and both are thrifty.

A short distance from the curiously joined holly trees grows "Crookedness," a cedar tree, which has assumed a most fantastic shape. This tree, instead of growing straight up into the air, has taken a course along the ground, only a few feet above it. The trunk grows in this manner fully twenty feet from its base, then it curves upward until its branches are reached. There everything becomes a tangled mass of branches, so crooked and intermingled that to follow the course of any limb is almost impossible. Within a stone's throw of the Wildwood Station, on this island, stands the arch or rainbow tree. It is a wild cherry. During the many years of its growth its trunk has assumed the shape of a perfect half circle. The tree is more than two feet in diameter. The trunk, after describing an arch, rises as straight as an arrow to a height of thirty feet. In 1892 President Harrison visited Wildwood and was greatly interested in the odd tree growths. It was upon the arch of the rainbow tree that he and Baby McKee sat to have their photographs taken. The antlers is probably the oddest of all the odd trees growing on the island. In this instance a large branch of a red cedar has grown into the form of a deer's antlers. The resemblance is almost perfect, even to the length and thickness of the prongs, of which their are five on each section. Unfortunately this odd branch was cut from the tree of which it was a part by a curiosity hunter. It was secured and is now on exhibition at Wildwood. There is a number of these curious tree growths on exhibition there. Included among them are a couple of holly branches which take the exact shape of a harp. A number of small branches grow from the main ones, taking the form of the harp strings. Philip P. Baker, of Wildwood, has in his possession holly and cedar branches which spell the name "Wildwood." The letters "w," "i" and "o" in the name are particularly well formed. A holly branch has grown into the shape of an elephant's trunk and the two long tusks of ivory look natural, as the wood of the holly is a creamy white. A tree of the magnolia variety growing up through the hollow trunk of an old cedar is another freak showing how oddly nature provides for her children. A magnolia seed undoubtedly was blown beneath the decayed trunk of the cedar tree and in the course of its growth found its way into the air and sunlight through an opening left by a decayed limb about ten feet from the ground. As the trunk of the imprisoned magnolia expands it will probably force the cedar to pieces.

Five-Mile Beach is not alone noted for its curious tree growths. It is a garden spot for wild flowers. A few years ago the Torrey Botanical Society of New York City visited and explored every nook and corner of the island, and its researches brought to light the fact that no fewer than sixty-eight species of wild flowers and several varieties of rare ferns were growing there. Nearly every wild flower found from Maine to Florida was included in the list.

AUTHORITY IN RELIGIOUS TEACHING.—"The truth is, and it is one ever to be remembered, that the Christian religion is a religion of authority. It was not the result of a process of searching after truth. It did not take its rise from a study of natural phenomena in the universe and in the mind of man. In other words, it is not the product of inductive reasoning after the manner of scientific systems. But as the only way of salvation for a world sunk in sin, it was a gift from God. It came by way of divine and supernatural revelation. It is something which men could never have discovered or invented for themselves. This means that a merciful God, looking forth upon his helpless creatures, set in order certain events and revealed in connection with them their divine significance. The basis of all is the Incarnation of the Eternal Son, which remains for all coming time an abiding fact, with all its wondrous power and efficacy. And by and with this manifestation of himself was revealed a body of truth, spiritual and ethical, to mould men's soul's within, and guide and form their lives. This is the glorious depositum committed to chosen men at the first, and by them transmitted to their successors for all time. It came to men by authority, and it is handed on by the same authority. There is no other way. All manner of proofs may be adduced to confirm the truth of God, proofs from history and from individual experience, but all these together would not have enabled men to discover the truth. They have to do with events that have happened, teaching that has been given.

"We conclude, therefore, upon this point, that the great fundamentals of the Christian faith must in their very nature be taught upon authority ; they must be instilled into the mind of the child as indisputable things. The Scriptures are to be searched, not for their discovery, but to illustrate and confirm them. To open the New Testament to the child and tell him that he is to construct his religious faith for himself, is a manifest absurdity. And it is safe to say that it is never really done."—Living Church.

Items Concerning the Society.

Joseph S. Elkinton arrived safely at home on the 16th instant after an absence of six weeks, the greater part of which time was spent among the Russian exiles in Manitoba and adjacent territory.

The twenty-three hundred Dukhobors held in Quarantine at Quebec were liberated about the 28th ultimo.

He spent two or three days with these and saw about one thousand of them start for their Western home ; the remainder were waiting for cars, which were then very much in demand on account of a national holiday. Prince D. A. Hilkoff sailed on the first instant from Quebec to join his family in Switzerland.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—Prompt approval by the State Department of the work of the Peace Conference will be cabled to the American delegates at The Hague, empowering them to sign the protocols in the name of the United States.

The Public Ledger of the 18th inst. says: The staff correspondents of the American newspapers stationed in Manila have united in a formal complaint, cabled by way of Hong Kong, against the press censorship system at Manila. They declare that the despatches made public in Washington incorrectly represent the existing conditions and err in the declaration that "the situation is well in hand," and in the assumption that the insurrection can be speedily ended without a greatly increased force. They especially charge: "Prohibition of hospital reports; suppression of full reports of field operations in the event of failure: numbers of heat prostrations in the field; systematic minimization of naval operations, and suppression of complete reports of the situation." The correspondents, it is further said, had two interviews on the subject with General Otis over a month ago, and complained to him that "the evident purpose of the censorship was not to keep information from the enemy, but to keep from the public a knowledge of the real conditions of affairs." General Otis "finally promised greater liberality, agreeing to pass all matter that he might consider not detrimental to the interests of the United States."

W. Barclay Parsons, the engineer representing the American railway concessionaires controlling the projected railroad from Canton to Hankow, China, called upon the Secretary of State on the 14th inst. and complained that the Chinese Government, through foreign influence, is obstructing the concessionaires. The Secretary has accordingly instructed the American Minister at Pekin to use his influence in behalf of the American company.

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Vanderlip, just returned to Washington from a month's trip through the West, estimates that the amount of gold which will come out of the Klondike this summer is $18,000,000, a large proportion of which will go through the Government Assay Office at Seattle.

George E. Roberts, Director of the Mint, has returned from an official trip in the West, during which he had special opportunities to observe conditions and to ascertain the feeling of the people on public questions. He reports that the most perfect satisfaction prevails with the present condition of the country. "I have never seen a more prosperous condition," said G. E. Roberts. "In all the walks of life there is prosperity and apparent content. Crops are splendid, and the farmers are in despair because of their inability to secure hands for the farms. This is because there is plenty of work in the cities, and labor has been drawn to the centres. Money is plentiful, and the far West seems to have all of its share. In fact, there is so much money that Nebraska banks, for instance, are competing for commercial paper in Chicago with interest at a low rate. I do not think this has ever occurred before. Heretofore the Western banks have never had too much money and have had to borrow from Chicago and the East. Money is going from the West to the East, and this renders the money market in the East easy. Therefore, American money is going to Europe, where interest is higher."

The new treaty between the United States and Japan went into effect on the 17th, according to foreigners in the Oriental country the same privileges enjoyed by native residents and imposing the same obligations.

F. B. Loomis, Minister to Venezuela, who arrived in New York on the 11th on the steamer Philadelphia, says that the only important public business of interest to Americans is the treaty establishing an improved postal service. The money order and parcel post systems are to be put into immediate operation. He has succeeded in getting this matter into such shape that this treaty was signed and everything is in readiness to begin.

The trade between the United States and Brazil last year showed a falling off, the exports to Brazil decreasing half a million dollars during the year, while the imports fell off no less than $12,000,000.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has made an order prohibiting banks from affixing stamps to checks unstamped when presented.

President Rice, of the Electric Vehicle Company, says that orders have been placed for 4200 electric carriages worth $8,000,000. This is an indication of the rapid growth in the popularity of these vehicles. A call has been issued for a meeting in Ninth Month of all persons interested in automobiles to form a national association to protect their rights.

The Life Saving Bureau has received the following telegram from Superintendent Hutchings, at Galveston, Texas, who with a force of life savers has been operating in the flooded districts: "Have rescued 542 people. Seven to fifteen feet of water over the cotton and cane plantations. Some drowned, many narrow escapes. Have surf boat and borrowed boat and seven men operating now under keepers. Waters receding."

The Texas Cotton Exchange estimates that the loss of cotton in the Brazos River bottoms will reach 200,000 bales, worth $5,000,000. At the same time the rains which produced the great flood have so benefited upland cotton that the crop this year will be the best ever harvested.

Reports were received at Duluth by grain men that vast clouds of grasshoppers had alighted on the fields in the vicinity of Rolla, N. D.

The Chicago Tribune of the 17th instant, prints revised figures gathered from correspondents throughout the country showing a loss of 141 lives resultant from the last 4th of Seventh Month celebration. Lockjaw caused the death of 83 out of the 141.

There were 482 deaths in this city last week, which is 47 more than the previous week and 11 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 154 were under one year of age; 249 were males and 233 females: 66 died of cholera infantum; 59 of consumption; 35 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 34 of heart diseases; 23 of old age; 21 of marasmus; 19 from casualties; 17 of diphtheria; 17 of pneumonia; 14 of nephritis; 14 of inanition; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of convulsions; 11 of cancer; 10 of apoplexy; 10 of uræmia, and 9 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 101 a 102; 4's, reg., 112 a 112½; coupon, 112½ a 113; new 4's, 130 a 130½; 5's, 112½ a 113; 3's reg., 108 a 108½; coupon, 109 a 109½.

COTTON was quiet, but steady, on a basis of 6$\frac{1}{16}$c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.00 a $2.25; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 a $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.30 a $3.50; spring, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; city mills, straight, $3.40 a $3.55. RYE FLOUR.—$3.00 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 74¼ a 74½c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 38 a 38½c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 31c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 6c.; good, 5¾ a 5⅞c.; medium, 5½ a 5⅝c., common, 5¼ a 5⅜c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 a 5¼c.; good, 4½ a 4¾c.; medium, 4 a 4¼c.; common, 2½ a 3¾c.; lambs, 4½ a 7¼c.

HOGS.—6 a 6¼c., and all offerings were sold.

FOREIGN.—The American Line steamer Paris was floated by the salvagers on the 11th instant, and anchored near the rocks upon which she had rested since she ran ashore on Fifth Mo. 21. She was towed into Falmouth harbor on the 12th instant.

Three months' court mourning for the death of the Czarewitch, Grand Duke George of Russia, brother of the Czar, who died on the 10th inst., of consumption at Abbas Tuman, in the Caucasus, has been ordered. The Czar announces that his throne devolves upon his brother, the Grand Duke Michael, if himself should die without leaving a son.

The largest mass of pure rock salt in the world lies under the province of Galicia, Hungary. It is known to be 550 miles long, 20 broad and 250 feet in thickness.

Over a quarter of a million of people have already perished in consequence of the famine in Russia.

The recent outbreak of the plague is the first reported in Egypt in fifty-five years.

Although pearls cannot yet be made in the laboratory, they can be slowly built up by natural process at the bottom of an aquarium. Signor Comba, who has been experimenting for several years in the artificial production of this much prized stone, is laying down a large quantity of pearl oysters on the shores of the Mediterranean, with a view to extended operations. The objection has been raised that the mother-of-pearl shell will not "live" in a temperature of less than 68 to 70 degrees Fahrenheit, and that the normal temperature of the Mediterranean is too low to give any hope of the success of the enterprise. The same experiment has been carried on in Queensland and Western Australia with great success, but those countries are at a prohibitive distance from the chief markets for mother-of-pearl, which are London, Hamburg and Trieste, the expense of conveying the pearls thither being too great.

The disproportion of the sexes is still very great in Australia. In West Australia, e. g., there were only 54,000 women in a population of 168,000.

The customs receipts at Havana for Sixth Month were $1,012,899. The total receipts for the six months of 1899 are $5,146,830.

The favorable reception given to the Mexican Government bonds in the United States has created an excellent impression in financial and business circles at the city of Mexico, and is regarded as indicating that hereafter Mexican enterprises will look more to the neighboring Republic than to Europe for financial support.

In Manitoba there are 2,500,000 acres under crops, which 1,600,000 is wheat.

Thoughts in the Neighborhood of an Ancient Monthly Meeting.

Sojourning on his native eastern shore, where Friends began to form a meeting in the year 1685, the present writer was drawn to look back into the first half-century of the Society within these parts.

Christ crucified, as "the wisdom of God and the power of God" was believed to be the living Foundation on which those Friends were concerned that the church in this place should be founded.

In their first half century in eastern Massachusetts, as in England and elsewhere, there was much to make us now hazard the thought that the Society lived as much as in all its two centuries since.

What baptisms of fire and the Holy Spirit it had known! Through what stress of persecutions it had lived, what martyrdoms, what times that tried men's souls! What labors and perils, what conquests it had witnessed, what enlargement in these colonies, what strong vitality in Christ, what unity in fundamental principles!

Here in eastern Massachusetts the Friends had borne the brunt of the battle for religious toleration in our country. The blood of the four martyrs on Boston common had sealed the victory for religious liberty in America. Friends were yet strong in the distinctive truths of their mission on earth, and their principles were strong in them. They gathered themselves into neighborhoods for their fellowship in those principles, and to uphold before the world the standard of the living and speaking Christ as the Word of God, the one Mediator between God and men, who "abideth a high priest continually." Him would they know directly, as being sheep of his that could hear his voice. "Let nothing stand between your souls and God but Christ" was the clear and distinctive charge left in the words of George Fox, upon them to keep. Away with all mediators, go-betweens, or middle-men but Christ, the true Bishop of souls. Any substitute for Him was a usurper, any intermediary but Him a false Christ, any other intervener, an intercepter—eclipsing the Truth, eclipsing his direct Light. The whole system of sacerdotalism, whether open in Episcopacy, or covert in Presbyter as "priest writ large" or in pastor, writ smaller, being thus clearly swept off from their consciences by the discovery of Christ as the Word and the Mediator — the whole priestly system could not sweep away the Society, though it had tried long and hard to do it—and may yet try again, both within and without—we may say is trying it within, as if preparatory to an easier victory eventually from without.

It is inevitable that a church built upon the rock of direct experience, or experimental revelation in the Spirit of Truth, should radically differ from any that are based or dependent on instrumentalities, or on products of inspiration rather than on inspiration itself—any whose right of way is conditioned on history rather than immediate grace; on delegates as from Peter on to other delegates down through the centuries sifting through delegate after delegate, successor after successor, till one would think the original virtue through Peter, even if it could be historically delegated, must e'er now have become diluted past recognition. How stoutly and often we affirm that parents however holy cannot give grace to their children: how then can men however holy, impart grace or spiritual validity to other people's children. But "the bread of God is He that cometh down from heaven and giveth life unto the world." It travels not, as human influence, persuasion, instruction, or personal magnetism may travel from man to man as conductors or mediums, but Divine grace descends upon men from above, that they may be individually fed from above, and receiving obediently that life from above may be born from above, taught from above, illuminated, strengthened, authorized from above for every required word and work; and that words given by inspiration may be understood by inspiration given.

It is inevitable that this principle of immediateness and perceptibleness in the manifestations of the Spirit of Truth, should build up an harmonious coherency of truths and practice peculiar to itself. So that a thoughtful man to whom the doctrine has been new, could scarcely under the witness for Truth embrace one of the doctrines germane to that root and follow out its spirit without sooner or later finding his convincement in accord with its whole outgrowth and system.

A Cappadocian Greek just after his graduation from the theological seminary at Hartford came down to Philadelphia and sought some of us out to say, that a few weeks before, in a second-hand book store, he had opened at the chapter on Baptism in Barclay's Apology. On reading a little he felt compelled to buy the book, and after pondering the chapter was convinced of the spiritual nature of the baptism intended by Christ for his own dispensation. But the chapter on the Supper with outward elements had no such force with him for a time. At length that which cleared his sight for the spiritual baptism did the same for the communion of the Spirit. And then all the doctrines set forth by Barclay were opened to him one by one as necessary to stand or fall as consistent complements one of another. And so said he: "I have embraced them all." Friends became interested in him, and aided him in his concern to translate the whole of Barclay's Apology into the Turkish language,—which he accomplished. This translation, which has been lying in wait for some right use, has been suggested as possibly available for the Dukhobors who understand that language and the basis of the doctrine. But the whole incident brought out from a college president the remark, that such is the coherency of all the Friends' doctrine in the one uniting principle, that it seems as if the embracing of one of them in living sincerity necessitates adopting the whole.

The truth of Christ the living Word being the same for every link of the chain of doctrine, is good for them all and we can trust it for them all. Apparently the first formal written declaration of the faith of Friends ever published, was issued in 1657 from Boston jail by three ministers, Christopher Holder, John Copeland, and Richard Doudney, of whom the two former were the instruments of gathering in the same year that which appears to be the first organized Friends' meeting in America—that in Sandwich, Massachusetts. The concluding portion of their creed or declaration has these words: "So that before all men we do declare that we do believe in God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; according as they are declared of in the Scriptures; and the Scriptures we own to be a true declaration of the Father, Son and Spirit. . . . Turn to the Spirit that showeth you the secret of your hearts, and the deeds that are not good. Therefore while ye have light, believe in the light, that you may be the children of the light; for, as you love and obey it, it will lead you to repentance, bring you to know Him in whom is remission of sins, in whom God is well pleased; who will give you an entrance into the kingdom of God, an inheritance amongst them that are sanctified."

There is no separation here of the light of Christ from evangelical doctrine. It leads into it when followed thoroughly, and sometimes in mercy alarms the sinner who has hated the light to say "a Saviour or I die." It leads to Him who tasted death, the wages of sin, for every man: Who gave his flesh for the life of the world, that the life thus to be had more abundantly, might be more abundantly the light of men—leading them to be reconciled by his death and much more saved by his life.

We cannot go back to the days of George Fox, or the pioneers of this meeting. But we cannot resume the Quakerism of the sons of the morning without going forward. By going forward is not necessarily "keeping up with the times," but with the daily openings of Christ's Spirit. The times (so-called) may be, in human practice and maxims, very wrong. We are saddened that they seem largely so now. But to go forward is to keep up with the Spirit—to "make all things according to the pattern shown thee in the mount" of individual revelation of truth and duty. If Quakerism were to keep up even with the times, there would be no special reason for its existence. Its peculiar progress has consisted and consists in being in advance of the times, where the Spirit of truth is Leader, saying "Where I am, there shall my servant be" And as it is up to date with Him rather than with the world, its simple following of the witness of the Spirit must make it a leader in pure righteousness, whether it dreams of its leadership or not,—more truly so if unconscious of its leadership. Its life has been prophetic, beholding and upholding ideals in church and state and society yet to be realized. Some of these the laggard times have come up to. Some, like that of Peace on earth, they seem at length willing to approach and consider. But if only an employee of its present day and generation, its ministry must be hireling; yet as a prophet of the Spirit the Society would hold forth the word of Truth for ideals of righteousness to which a crooked and perverse generation hates to aspire.

Are we who remain, going in the newness of the Spirit rather than in the spirit of newness to be witnesses of Christ and so for Christ in the twentieth century? The future will answer. We will not say; "Go back to Him who can speak to thy condition," but rather, "Go forward and inward to the same—Christ Jesus, the same yesterday, to-day and forever."

If George Fox had gone back from his revelation of the spiritual Christ, he would have gone back under a man-made and man-paid ministry of the pastorate system. Shall a step backward for him, be a forward step for us? If George Fox had wanted to go back one year from his spiritual experience of Christ as the Word of God, or our pioneers fifty years back from their testimony for Christ as the practical Head over all things to his Church, they might have had opportunity to have returned to the speakings and the singings and the performings for worship that waited on the ordering of a human leader. Where are we, if so recreant a retreat for them, would be a glorious advance for us? Nay rather, shall we not seek to say: "For me to live is Christ. For me to pray is Christ. For me to preach is Christ. For me to praise is Christ:—Christ once offered for the sins of many, the hope of redemption; Christ in us the hope of glory; Christ the head over all things to his members; Christ our communion and passover slain for us; Christ the Baptist of his new dispensation,—the Baptizer of all baptizers into the Divine name wherever they go or are; Christ who hath all power in heaven and on earth, hath power to forgive sins, power to conduct a meeting."

If the churches of the land should yet have such confidence in Him as to open out their meetings to the free ministration of his Spirit should we not hail it as a spiritual advance for them? Small encouragement they have in us, if our meetings retreat towards them. Small encouragement also on the other hand, if our silence or our unstated ministry, for lack of being held in the power of God does not demonstrate to them any superiority of the Spirit and of power in our mode of worship. It is not the fault of the Power, or of the mode opened for its freedom.

There are signs in the times encouraging us to apprehend that the twentieth century even now begins to crave to be an enlargement of the seventeenth, and open to a new revelation of its unchanging gospel. May we be faithful to hand on its legacy so well compressed in these words; "We commend you to God and to the Word of his grace, which is able to build us up." The same Word and grace is able also to give us an inheritance among all them that are sanctified.

For "The Friend."

Harmoniously Laboring for Truth's Honor.

As members "one of another," and of the same spiritual body and household of faith, we are equally dependent upon the one eternal Spirit for ability to edify one another in love.

All the members being subject to that "law of an endless life" which governs the whole commonwealth of the true Israel of God, they can labor harmoniously for Truth's honor.

By such exercise a growth in their several gifts is experienced, and the preciousness of increase in the knowledge and power of Divine life inspires the struggling soul to press on in the conflict with every disabling condition.

An establishment as well as enlargemen follows faithfulness to apprehended duty.

The perplexities of youth are removed o replaced by the greater problems of an ad vanced stage of experience, the needed strengt and wisdom being added.

The weakness of our nature may often caus the heart to fail; yet, in the midst of ever discouragement, there is the immutable foun dation of belief in the love and power of ou Heavenly Father, confirmed by the seal of ou own consciousness of Him as knowing and owr ing all who really trust Him.

With this assurance and hope in his merc the weakest member may receive an increas of strength by virtue of that vitality whic the whole body possesses and "each joint sup plieth."

Hereby also we have "fellowship one wit another," and bear one another's burdens—thu fulfilling the law of Christ.

How can we be otherwise "built up together in a soul-satisfying sense, without coming int this hallowed relationship—which unites all th members in a holy covenant of peace? E.

The Present Trial of Faith.

The race in its wantonness has been ab temporarily to defy the absolute Love.

One must either say this, or confess tha history as it stands, in all its blood and tear is the expression of the Divine mind.

The faith that [trusts God though he see to permit] a temporary limit upon his ow power, seems to me infinitely better than th belief that would destroy his moral integrit We can bear the mystery of iniquity if its or gin is not in the Divine will; we can wait hope and work in joy if we can believe that th whole movement of God in Christ is to swee his universe clean of everything but righteou ness. This is the faith that is to take hold men in the future. It has a power of appe that no noble nature can resist. It offers cause that is all Divine. It presents an iss to be won by the joint action of God and ma wholly and infinitely good, and the moral n ture of man needs the appeal of just such faith.

A One-Wheeled Wagon.—Another fa worth remembering is that however it may in "our churches," in God's churches as d scribed in the New Testament no such offic as "the pastor" was known. There were "pa tors and teachers" in the primitive church, w were the elders in the church, whom the Ho Spirit had made overseers or bishops to she herd the flock of God (Acts xx: 17. 28); a there were men who were sent forth by t Holy Ghost to preach the gospel of Christ, w had a right to live of the gospel (Acts xiii: I Cor. ix: 14); but a hired settled pastor, to all the work, was as foreign to the chur which Christ founded as a shingle-nail wou be driven into the works of a well regulat watch. Is it strange that a wagon with o wheel does not run smoothly?

TIBERIAS, on the Shore of Galilee,
700 feet below sea-level,
Fourth Month 16th, 1899.

Our last letter went from Damascus, and now we are encamped on the shores of this lovely lake, about half a mile from the town of Tiberias. Behind us rise the hills of Galilee, while in front are the beautiful mountains of Gilead. Snowy Hermon towers up to the northeast, reminding us of our scramble over his rocky sides a few days ago.

Our march from Damascus began on the 14th. We mounted our horses about 7.45, and soon left the city far behind. It is an interesting place, but we were glad to leave it, for it is so filthy, and the dogs were abominable to the last degree. I am sure I would never want another dog if I staid long in Damascus.

It was a lovely day for the start, and we rode for four hours through a beautiful valley with Hermon before us. About noon our lunch tent was put up by the side of a tiny stream, and a most refreshing repast was spread out before us. After a rest we continued our march, and rode to Kafar Howah, where our tents were all ready for us, as our baggage passed us while we were resting after lunch.

There is a small village at Kafar Howah, but we were camped in a charming garden surrounded by apricot, walnut, pear, and poplar trees. A branch of the Pharpar flows near. On our march we forded the Pharpar several times, and also drank of its cool water. Our ride was very pleasant, but after being nearly seven hours in the saddle we were tired. Of course we walk the horses mostly and take only an occasional gallop for variety. Before we reached Kafar Howah the hills of Bashan came into view on the south. At one place we saw some beautiful gazelles feeding on the hillside. Chalil put spurs to his horse and galloped madly after them, hoping to drive them near that we might see them to satisfaction. We saw their little white tails as they fled before him, but they did not come very close to us; for the fields were stony Chalil could not go quite at full speed, though he rode very furiously, and looked like a brigand with a dagger at his side. His costume adds much to his picturesque appearance. Not far from our camping-place is the traditional tomb of Nimrod, and the Mohammedans say no dew falls on the ground in that vicinity because of him!

Fourth-day morning we started about 7.25. We now began some very rough mountain climbing. Our horses are wonderfully surefooted, and the cat-like agility with which they climb over the stones is amazing. I never saw such roads, and would not have believed it possible to ride over them if I had not done so! We lunched again near noon at a pretty little green spot called Marj Hadar, where there was water for the horses.

About two o'clock we again pushed on and before we reached our camping ground our horses passed over snow, and we had some snow to eat! Our tents were pitched on a threshing-floor near the village of Mejdal Shams, about three thousand seven hundred feet above sea-level. We were near snow, and it was so cold we took hot water bottles to bed with us. Even then one had to pile all available clothing on the bed before getting warm enough. In the evening we had a call from the teacher and preacher in the American Presbyterian mission in the town. He spoke English fairly well and seemed very glad to see us. He asked if we were Presbyterians. We told him we were Friends, and we were surprised to find he seemed to understand what that name implied. He said, "Yes, you believe in speaking by the Holy Ghost." We told him we did not pay our ministers, when he replied, "Paul said, 'they that preach the gospel should live of the gospel!'" He said he had so much to tell us, but he could not say it in English. In the morning he brought his wife and baby down to see us off.

We started about the usual time, and had such rough scrambling over the rocks that E. said he thought it was "tempting Providence" to ride over such places, and he walked over some of the worst of it. After about two hours and a half we reached the old castle overlooking the valley of the Jordan, which marks the boundary between Syria and Palestine.

The beautiful hills of Naphtali lay beyond the fertile valley, and the colors—pink, grey, red and green, made an enchanting landscape. We spent some time climbing over the rocks and drinking in the charming prospect. It was here, on one of these hills of Hermon, that the Transfiguration took place—or at least it is thought so by most authorities.

By noon we went down the mountain to the old site of Cæsarea Philippi, where we had lunch. Here is one of the principal sources of the Jordan. A beautiful, clear spring gushes out of the rocks in a number of places, and forms quite a rushing stream, bordered by poplars and some other trees. We ate our lunch on the floor of an old mosque high up on the hill. While here we met a lady and her father from New York. They had come up from Jerusalem, and were on their way to Beyrouth. We enjoyed meeting them very much, and they were full of enthusiasm about the trip. We met two other parties, one of them (two English ladies), were robbed the night before, which made Chalil very anxious when we encamped in the same place.

We rode round the hill of Dan and forded the Jordan to see two large terebinth trees, on which numerous rags were hanging. For these are considered holy trees, and the people put pieces of their clothes on them for offerings—as we saw on the old plane tree in Damascus, which I mentioned before.

Our next ride was through the valley of the Jordan, and was much smoother than mountain climbing. We saw large flocks of beautiful storks which let us come quite near them.

Our lunch place was by the side of another source of the Jordan, a beautiful stream, in which R. and I enjoyed wading very much, though the stones were so sharp we could scarcely stand.

Fourth Month 19th, 1899.

We camped that night at Jauneh, a Jewish settlement founded by Rothschild, and it was the cleanest and most civilized place we had been in. Our tents were pitched high up on a hill, which gave us an extensive view of the Jordan valley, and the waters of Merom.

The evening before we reached Jauneh we were sitting reading the Bible in our dining tent, when two men walked in and came right up to shake hands with me. Chalil had fallen to sleep on the floor, but he soon sprang up and acted as interpreter, though one of the men spoke some English. They had a house in the neighborhood, and when we rode by the next morning they had matting and cushions on the ground in front of the house, and we had to dismount and drink some Turkish coffee with them. It seemed very strange, but that is the thing to do here, you must drink coffee on all occasions, and if you smoke a hubble-bubble pipe you are "right in it." It is needless to say I have not begun to smoke yet, but I never saw so much of it in my life, and there is no telling what the consequences may be.

Fourth Month 20th.—Now we are encamped on Mount Carmel up above the town of Haifa. We left Jauneh early on the 15th, and reached Bethsaida on the lake of Galilee about eleven o'clock. There is nothing left of the town but a few ruins. Our table-cloth was spread in a charming little garden under a lemon-tree. About us were oranges, pomegranates, locust, palm, pine, apple, willow, apricot, mulberry and tamarisk trees, as well as grapes and oleanders!

Before lunch E. and Chalil went up the shore a little distance and took a swim. R. and I waded awhile and then sat on the stones and gathered the pretty little shells that are so abundant there.

After lunch a boat came for us (which Chalil had ordered in the morning), and our boatman rowed us up to the supposed site of Capernaum, where there is now a Franciscan monastery, and a few fragments of ancient buildings.

After walking about a little we again entered the boat and were rowed down to our camping place a little below Tiberias. On the way we saw Magdala, the supposed home of Mary Magdalene, and very near by the plain of Gennesaret. On the other side of the lake the spot is pointed out where the "swine ran down a steep place into the sea." It seemed wonderful to be actually in a boat on the lake of Galilee, and I was glad we spent First-day there, so that we might drink it in and receive a strong impression of it.

First-day morning we had fish for breakfast right out of the lake, and they were good, though we thought they lacked the flavor of salt-water fish. There were hot springs quite near our camp, the water of which contains both salt and sulphur, I believe, and is considered very remarkable for rheumatism; so that people come and stay there for weeks, just to take the hot baths. We thought it would be fun to try it, so R. and I walked down to see what it was like. We were ushered into a large room, in one end of which was a hole in the floor, which I should think was six feet long by four feet wide and five feet deep. Into this pit water was pouring, and E., Chalil and the man that takes care of the bath were all interested to get it tempered properly, for the water comes almost boiling hot. Indeed it is so hot that people come and boil their fish and eggs in the spring. Well, at last the water was within a foot of the top, and the three men pronounced it cool enough. I could not reach it, and so took their word for it and they went out. You may judge of our chagrin, when ready to bathe, to find the water about as hot as could possibly be endured. We tried to turn in cold water, but were unable to do so. We then attempted to get in gradually. It was very exciting, but we finally managed it. I never was so nearly par-boiled in my life. The room was all steamy, too. So we really had the equivalent of a Turkish bath. When through we ran down and bathed in the Lake of Galilee to get cooled off.

The birds, lizards, and flowers here are so interesting. I often wonder how I was so favored as to come to this wonderful land. Each day seems so much better than the one before, that I wonder when the summit of enjoyment will be reached.

I hope we can press a few flowers and bring them home in a tolerable state of preservation. I never saw such bowers of beauty. Every hill and valley is such a mass of bright, beautiful colors, that we feel as though we ought not to ride over them. The flowers that we cultivate with such care grow wild here, and are finer than we can produce with our best efforts.

ON HANDWRITING.—I had occasion recently to examine the public land records of the District of Columbia, and I was impressed anew with what I have frequently noticed here and elsewhere, namely, that good, sensible, legible copyists have become almost extinct. In many of the older states there are public records a century or more old. These you will almost invariably find written in clear and regular engrossing hands. Copyists made a profession of their work, and learned to do it thoroughly. Now generally a copyist in a public office is someone who has the requisite amount of political influence to get the appointment. This accounts for the fact that so many of our records are made in illegible, scrawling unformed hands. I observe that some of the records are lumbered up with the remarkable English style of chirography so much affected by our young women of the day—a style of writing that certainly has no place in a record book, if it has anywhere indeed. While typewriting will largely take the place of handwriting in the years to come, there will always be a demand for clerks that can write a sensible business hand when called on to do so. Now, by a business hand we do not mean the copy-book script that is so largely taught. The ability to write well is an art, only to be acquired by practice. Hence it is worth while for any young person who expects to enter active life to practice writing persistently until a good free hand is formed. Otherwise well prepared young men and women are missing good positions every day because they can't write. And there is so little excuse for this that no earnest person should permit it to apply to his case.—Pathfinder.

THE youth of the land should be taught that what they sow they will be likely to reap. It is the good seed only that will bring good fruit. How can it be reasonably expected that wild oats are the kind of seed that will bring a good and useful harvest? I urge upon the young men that they as the architects of their own characters, begin aright. There is no real smartness in being wild. Sowing wild oats is not a thing that any sensible person would laugh at or regard as trivial.—Dr. Peters.

OUR CONSOLER.

Dear Lord how could we e'or endure
The trials of this life,
If thou wert not consoling us,
In all our cares and strife.
Thou teachest us the power of pain,
Our souls, to purify,
And when the world seems dark and drear,
Thou all canst rectify.

If we will only trust thy love,
Thou'lt give a healing balm
To make our thoughts, so much disturbed,
Again regain their calm.
Thou never wilt forsake us Lord,
If we but trust in thee,
Thy mercy, pity, pardon too,
For us shall ever be.

Then let us in all trials and cares
Dear Lord, come straight to thee,
And thy sweet consolation seek,
To make our spirits free
From petty cares which oft annoy
And fill our souls with gloom,
For thou canst fill our hearts with joy,
If we will give love room.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Reverend and Rev.

I read in this morning's newspaper that the Rev. —— ——— had been arrested for embezzlement. Did the reporter introduce the word "reverend" as a gentle bit of irony when he specified the man who had been stealing? No—he spoke in sober earnest, and evidently thought there was nothing incongruous about it. But how can a thief be reverend?

There is only one place in the Bible where the term "reverend" is used. It is in Psalms cxi: 9. There the inspired writer speaking of God, exclaims, "Holy and reverend is his name."

The word "holy," is frequently applied to men and women on the sacred page. Paul addresses his holy brethren (Heb. iii: 1). Peter speaks of the holy women of old and of how they should be adorned (1 Peter iii: 5.) We are told to be holy in all life and conversation (2 Peter iii: 11). Above all our blessed Saviour is referred to as being holy. But He who is the Son of God—He whom Paul says has by inheritance a more excellent name than the angels (Heb i: 4)—even He, is nowhere designated by the adjective "reverend." This lofty title of respect, is in the Bible accorded only to the Creator and Father of all things in heaven and on earth. For Him only is this word reserved.

Why then should men apply "reverend" to clergymen, and "right reverend" to bishops, and so on? How inconsistent! what presumption, to ascribe to men the title or attribute, which in the Holy Scriptures is applied only to God.

Early church history reveals that in the first centuries of the Christian era, this or other titles were not granted to church dignitaries. Indeed, there were no church dignitaries. Who ever heard of the Rev. Mr. Paul, or Rev. Mr. John? Why should modern preachers arrogate to themselves or accept a title, which their preceptors Paul or John never dared to assume? In those early days there was no division into clergy and laity: All stood equal, no matter how different gifts were assigned by the great Head of the church to its individual members. There was the grand priesthood of believers, and the one great high priest between God and man, Christ Jesus.

But as the early purity became impaired, th appellation of "reverend" along with othe flattering expressions, crept into the slumber ing church. For the past two hundred year the Society of Friends has been almost the on ly denomination which has protested agains its use.

It is now a poor excuse to say that time have changed, and that the need of this testi mony on our part has ceased. The word mean what it used to mean years ago—the idea i the same. Even when used to designate class, it is in doubtful taste. There are, it i true, some ministers who do not care for thi handle. But neglect to address some other in this way, and they are offended. It look as if their pride was hurt—a pride founded o the misuse of a word which means so muc that is sacred, and which should be addresse only to God.

I have seen a Friend's pastor's cards printe "Rev. so-and-so." How pitiful! Shall we g back to the weak and beggarly elements o of which our fathers in the Truth were de livered? Will not some dear Friends thin about this matter, and resolve to continu bearing this old-fashioned Quaker testimon which is so founded on common sense and on vital principle? Anyhow, why should we giv any flattering titles to men? Said one of ol "I know not to give flattering titles; in s doing my maker would soon take me away (Job xxxii: 22).

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

THE OLD-FASHIONED BIBLE.—The Asiat Quarterly Review lately contained a collectio of facts to prove its contention that the san tary laws of Moses were not only on a li with the modern rules of hygiene, but in son cases in advance of them.

The Jew, thousands of years before Chris settling in a semi-tropical country, was forbi den to eat pork or shell-fish, and milk w designated as a source of contagion. In t Talmud a method of slaughtering animals w prescribed which is acknowledged to-day our markets as the most sanitary.

Five thousand years before Doctor Ko gave to the world the results of his research in bacteriology the Mosaic law pointed o the danger to man from tuberculosis in catt but did not forbid infected poultry as foo It was only a few years ago that German spe ialists discovered that fowl tuberculosis w harmless to man.

The Mosaic law also enforced the isolati of patients with contagious diseases, and t burial of the dead outside of all cities. The hints the slow Gentile world did not fully a cept until a century or two ago.

The wise lawgiver prescribed not only fa ing at certain periods of the year, but the r moval of whole families in summer out camps, where for a time they could live clo to nature and to God, and rejoice in both wi innocent merrymaking. Many of the laws Moses, like this one, the Asiatic Quarter urges, were prescriptions intended for t health of both soul and body.

Now that some of our young people profe to regard the Old Testament as a book wh mission is fulfilled, a careful study of it mig cause them to change their opinion. Ap from its moral teachings, its physical rules, eyed, would lessen the prevalence of some the diseases among us, especially those ich result from exhausted nervous systems. —Youth's Companion.

For "The Friend."

It is one thing to feel a liberty to do that ich is agreeable to us; it is quite another feel a necessity laid upon us, to take a stand ainst a thing which has become popular ong our associates.

Both are at times required of the humble lower of Christ; and both, no doubt have ir place and use, according to the degree of vine authority felt to accompany them.

But there is always a power accompanying "woe is me, if I preach not the gospel," ich is seldom, if ever, felt in the simple erty to preach it.

So it is in what we may have to hand forth any way. The written discourse may be acnpanied by Divine authority, or it may savor good in an intellectual way, but the power reach the heart, depends upon the former.

To stand up against a current of popularity s seemed a cross to me, at this time; but ling that herein consists my peace of mind, m made willing to bear the epithet of being row-minded, or whatever may be said of me, thus bearing my testimony against what ms to me, to be gaining among the people our Society; namely. The forming of assotions and other less formal gatherings, for ious purposes, especially for raising funds charitable uses; and also, large family and ool re-unions on birthday and other anniveries.

would not wish to be understood as having ection to the liberal upholding of good ses, by means of contributions, etc.; but I feel that I must throw in my mite, against show and ostentation of gathering together great companies for such purposes.

We are a Peace, Temperance and Missionary iety; and I trust we are a people who love give charities in all good causes. But dear ends, are we heeding the injunction to "Let thy right hand know what thy left hand th," when we assemble ourselves together make such public display of our interest in ood cause? If the money we spend in preation for such events, and in travelling to from them, together with what we subbe our names to give, were given in a less lic manner, I believe we would receive more robation of Him who said, "Take heed that lo not your alms before men, to be seen of m: otherwise ye have no reward of your her which is in heaven."

here is a perceptible increase in the number e-unions for celebrating anniversaries, etc., ch it seems to me are out of place. The ple re-union of families, when kept in probounds, without the extravagance generally wn on such occasions, in the preparation rich food to gratify the fleshy appetite; and bout such numbers as are usually invited of ant relatives, etc., might be allowable. But lieve that, were we more diligent to be d following the dictates of Best Wisdom, manifested to each one of us individually, he Light within, we would find many other 's for being sociable with our fellow men, ch would show less of selfishness.

he "poor" we have with us always, and "the widow and the fatherless" should be no less the objects of our thought than in the time of our Saviour. Then there are meek ones who come among us as it were, in vile raiment, but whom we neglect to notice, while we have respect to those in more costly apparel. Could we be as careful and offer a word of encouragement to these, to hand the cup of cold water to the famishing ones, as we are to meet together for our own gratification, I believe a greater blessing would rest upon us spiritually, and we would experience more growth in grace.

I do not wish to look on the dark side, but I desire to believe, and I do believe that there are many among us who have large and open hearts and who are seeking the things of the kingdom, and to be found walking lowly before men. But is it as universally the case as it should be? Are not many of us harboring in our bosoms, desires after show and vain glory?

Let us come out from among the things that are keeping us from a closer walk with God, and be careful lest we drift in full current into the ways and pastimes of the world. "Wherefore, come out from among them and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

George Fox as "Cromwell's Greatest Contemporary."

THE New Age recently contained a warmly appreciative article on George Fox by A. E. Fletcher, late editor of the Daily Chronicle. The following extracts will be read with interest:—

"While we are celebrating the tercentenary of Cromwell's birth we ought not to forget that some of his contemporaries were greater than himself. Amongst them was George Fox. Thomas Carlyle, Cromwell's greatest biographer, seems to have been convinced that of all the heroes of England's heroic age, George Fox was, at any rate, the most spiritually minded and the most courageous. Perhaps the most remarkable incident in modern history, says Carlyle, is not the Diet of Worms, still less the battle of Austerlitz, Waterloo, Peterloo, or any other battle, but 'an incident passed carelessly over by most historians, and treated with some degree of ridicule by others, namely, George Fox's making to himself a suit of leather. This man, the first of the Quakers, and by trade a shoemaker, was one of those to whom, under ruder or purer form, the Divine idea of the universe is pleased to manifest itself, and across all the hulls of ignorance and earthly degradation shines through, in unspeakable awfulness, unspeakable beauty, on their souls, who, therefore, are rightly accounted prophets, God possessed.'

"Toward Fox's conception of Christianity as a spiritual life, independent of churches and sacraments, and of Governments supported by violence, the serious thought of the present day is tending more and more, but it needed a courageous man to preach his doctrines in the turbulent times in which he was born. It was surely a bold thing to refuse to take an oath at a time when oath-taking—the swearing of allegiance to the State—was the corner-stone of the Constitution; and it was equally bold to refuse to take arms when Cavaliers and Puritans were engaged in a life-and-death struggle. The dauntless courage, the fiery eloquence, the marvellous energy, with which this inspired shoemaker carried out his great work, make as wonderful a record of heroism and devotion as anything to be found in the annals of war. Fox, however, was not infallible, his great defect was his intolerance. He believed he had the light, and that all beyond was darkness. With all his limitations, however, he was a truly noble soul. Perhaps no man ever suffered more for conscience' sake, or bore his sufferings more patiently. Hustled from one prison to another, thrown into dungeons reeking with loathsomeness, and kept there for weary months and even years, knocked about, kicked, bruised, and insulted, he yet never swerved from the course which he thought it his duty to take. The Blasphemy Act, the Act of Uniformity, the Conventicle Act, the Five Mile Act had no terrors for him. He defied them all. Nor would he stoop to the tricks by which some of the Nonconformists used to evade these iniquitous laws. These good people, when they came to their meetings, prohibited by the Conventicle Act, would have 'candles, and tobacco-pipes, flagons of drink, cold meat, and bread and cheese upon the table, and so when the officers of justice entered the room it would be no religious conventicle, but a social party of jovial Englishmen that was going forward.' George Fox would never sanction artifices of this kind. He held his meetings openly and took the consequences."

"The Quakers by no means escaped persecution even in the Commonwealth days. Cromwell was favourably disposed towards them, but the Independents, who dominated the army, were bitterly opposed to them. I have often expressed the opinion that if Cromwell had been brought earlier in his career under the influence of George Fox he would have become a Quaker."

"Professor Thorold Rogers' remark to the effect that the Puritans were exclusively upper and middle class men, and cared little for the workers and the poor, does not apply to George Fox. As John Rowntree, of York, shows in an admirable appreciation of George Fox, delivered to the University Extension students at Oxford, he used to visit the statute hirings to urge the magistrates to fix the rate of wages fairly. He seems to have anticipated Ruskin in his contention for the principle of the living wage. As J. Rowntree further shows, Fox was an abolitionist long before Clarkson and Wilberforce were heard of. 'When the institution of negro slavery presented itself as a practical problem to be dealt with, his faith that every man, without distinction of race, was the subject of Divine illumination and of a universal redemption prompted him to urge emancipation as the ultimate issue of domestic servitude. Similar considerations led him to demand just treatment for the Red Indians of America.' Truly a noble soul!"

MONKEYS IN A GOLD MINE.—Captain E. Moss, of the Transvaal, tells the following story of the monkeys who work for him in the mines:

"I have twenty-four monkeys," said he, "employed about my mines. They do the work of seven able-bodied men. In many instances they lend valuable aid where a man is useless. They gather up small pieces of quartz that would be passed unnoticed by the working men, and pile them up in little heaps that can easily be gathered up in a shovel and thrown into a mill. They work just as they please, sometimes going down into the mines when they have cleared up all the debris on the outside. They live and work together without quarreling any more than men do. They are quite methodical in their habits, and go to work and finish up in the same manner as human beings would do under similar circumstances. It is very interesting to watch them at their labor, and see how carefully they look after every detail of the work they attempt. They clean up about the mines, follow the wheelbarrows and carts used in mining, and pick up everything that falls off on the way."—Tit-Bits.

G. F. went to Selby and Beverly, and at a steeple-house his speaking did so please the auditory, that he was desired to come again. But he directed them to their teacher, Christ Jesus, and so went away.

Next day to Cranswick, to Captain Pursloe's, and Justice Hotham's, who entering into discourse with G. F. told him he had known that principle above ten years, and was glad that the Lord did publish it abroad among the people. The next First-day Captain Pursloe came to G. F., and they both went to the steeple-house, where G. F. when the priest had done, spoke to both priests and people—some received the doctrine of Truth, and continued in it. He came to York, and the First-day of the week he went to the cathedral, and told them then, "this was the word of the Lord God unto them, that they lived in words, but God Almighty looked for fruits among them." Then he was hurried out and thrown down the steps. Yet several were convinced. Next day to Burraby, and many were convinced. Next day to Cleaveland, some convinced. From thence to Stath, where he had great meetings, and many received the Truth, among whom was Philip Searth, a priest that afterwards came to be a minister of the Gospel among those called Quakers. . . . Oftentimes he had opportunities to speak to the priests, who when they heard of his coming would hide themselves, when it was told them the man in leather breeches is come ; for this was his dress in those days, not out of any superstition, but it was not unsuitable for one that travelled so much as he did. He wore linen also.

One of the priests, called Boyes, at Malton did invite him to preach in his steeple-house, but G. F. had little inclination to do that, because both priests and people called that place of worship the "house of God" whereas the apostle said to the Athenians, "God dwelleth not in temples made with hands." And therefore he endeavored to draw people off from them, and to make them sensible that God and Christ ought to dwell in their hearts, that so their bodies might be made the temples of God. Yet for that time he went into the steeple-house at Malton, when there were not above eleven hearers, to whom the priest was preaching ; but after it was known in the town that G. F. was there, it was soon filled with people. And when the priest had done, he sent the other that had invited him thither to bring him up into the pulpit. But G. F. sent him word that he needed not to go into the pulpit, that he could be seen and heard well enough where he was.

At Pickering G. F. had a meeting in a schoolhouse, where many priests and professors came, and asked several questions, which were answered to their satisfaction. Many persons were convinced, and word was carried to Justice Robinson that his priest, whom he loved more than all the others, was overthrown and convinced. After the meeting they went to an inn and the said priest was very loving and would have paid for G. F's dinner, but this he would not suffer. Then he offered that he should have his steeple-house to preach in, but G. refused, and told him and the people that he came to bring them off from such things to Christ.*

G. F. coming with priest Boyes into a town and hearing the bells ring, asked what that was for. They told him it was for him to preach in the steeple-house. Walking thither, he saw the people were gathered together in the yard. The priest who accompanied him would have had him go into the steeple-house, but he said it was no matter. This seemed strange to the people that he would not go into that which they called the house of God. But he stood up in the yard and declared that the ground on which these their temples stood was no more holy than any other piece of ground, ... and that all who preach Christ, the word of life, ought to preach freely, as the apostles did, and as Christ had commanded ; that the Lord God of heaven and earth had sent him to preach freely, and to bring people off from the outward temples made with hands, in which God dwelleth not ; that so they might know their bodies were to become the temples of God and Christ. That people ought to come to the spirit and grace of God in themselves, and to the light of Jesus in their own hearts ; that so they might come to know Christ their free teacher, to bring them salvation, and to open the Scriptures to them. At length he and priest Boyes came to this priest's steeple-house in the moors, and the priest, going before, held open the pulpit door, but G. F. told him he would not go into it. And this steeple-house being very much painted, he told him and the people that the painted beast had a painted house. And he told them that, as the end of the apostles' going into the temple and synagogues was not to hold them up, but to bring people to Christ, the substance, so the end of his coming there was not to hold up these temples, priests and tithes, but to bring them off from all these things to Christ, the substance, etc.

In Puttrington, going into an inn, he desired lodging, but it was denied him; then asked for a little meat or milk, offering to pay for it, but this also was refused. After he was gone out of the town, he desired to have some meat, drink and lodging for his money, but they would not suffer him to stay there ; then he went to another house and met with the like refusal. By this time it was grown so dark that he could not see the highway, but perceiving a ditch, he found a little water, and so refreshed himself. Then he got over the dit and being weary, sat down among the fu bushes till it grew day. Then he arose, a passing on through the fields, a man came aft him with a pike staff, &c. He was carri back to Puttrington, guarded. At last a d creet man called him into his house, where got some milk and bread, not having eaten some days before. Then he was carried ab nine miles to a justice. G. F. spoke to hi and laying his hand upon him, he was so brou down by the Lord's power, that all the wat men stood amazed. Then he desired to what he had in his pockets of letters, &c. T G. F. pulled out his linen and showed that had no letters, which made the justice say, " is not a vagrant by his linen," and set him liberty.

There was a report that he would not lie any bed, raised, doubtless, because about t time he had lain often without doors. He h a great meeting at Puttrington, and many w convinced that day of the truth he preache and they were exceeding sorry they had given him lodging when he was there befo Justice Hotham asked G. F. whether any peo had abused him ; but he esteeming it his d to forgive all, told him nothing of that kin

A false accuser said before the people, t G. F. said he was Christ. G. F. kindled w zeal, stepped upon the table, and said to people, that Christ was in them except t were reprobates ; and that it was Christ, eternal power of God, that spoke in him that time unto them, not that he was Christ

G. F. said that this false accuser was a Juc etc., and this Judas soon after hanged h self, etc.

At Warnsworth in Yorkshire, he being thr out of the steeple-house, was sorely bea with staves, and clods and stones were thr at him. At Doncaster, after the priest done, he began to speak, but was hurried and haled before the magistrates, who thre ened him with death if ever he came thit again.

Being put out with some of his friends, were with him, they were stoned by the r multitude. An innkeeper that was a bai seeing this, came and took them into his ho but one of the stones that was thrown, hit head, so that the blood ran down his face.

The next First-day, G. F. went to Tick where he went into the steeple-house, and t found the priest and the chief of the paris the chancel, to whom he began to speak ; they immediately fell upon him, and the c struck him with his bible so violently on face that the blood gushed out, and he exceedingly. Then the people thrust him of the steeple-house, beat and threw him do and dragged him along the street, so tha was besmeared with blood and dirt, and his taken away. Some moderate justices r hearing how G. F. and his friends had b abused, came to examine the business and clerk was afraid of having his hand cut off ; G. F., as a true Christian, forgave him, would not appear against him.

The Dukhobors' Character and Belief.

BY WILLIAM EVANS.

s an appendix to letters describing a visit he Russian Exiles' villages in Assiniboia, writer has thought it might interest some ers to condense an account of their religi- views and practices, from Vladimir Tchert- 's book, "Christian Martyrdom in Russia," lished by Geo. N. Morang, Toronto, Canada; he would recommend a perusal of the whole k, as containing a full and reliable account his remarkable community, to whom our ntion has been so recently drawn.

heir origin is unknown, even to themselves, they have no written or printed history, has tradition preserved amongst them any rmation upon the subject. The name, sig- ing "Spirit Wrestlers," was given as far k as 1785, probably by the then bishop of terinoslaff. It is not their own title for r religious organization, but they style nselves "Christians of the Universal Broth- ood," "because all men are equal, children ne Father, God; and those who live in deeds not only in word may belong to it and be bers of this universal body." The founda- of the Spirit-Wrestlers' teaching consists e belief that the Spirit of God is present e soul of man, and directs him by its word in him. The Church is where two or three gathered together, that is, united in the e of Christ. Their teaching is founded on ition. This tradition is called among them "Book of Life," because it lives in their ory and hearts. It consists of Psalms, ly formed out of the contents of the Old New Testaments, partly composed inde- lently. They found alike their mutual re- ns and their relations to other people—and only to people, but to all living creatures, usively on love; and therefore they hold all le equal, brethren. In all that does not nge what they regard as the will of God, willingly fulfil the desire of the Govern- t authorities. They are industrious and emious in their lives, and always truthful heir speech, accounting all lying a great They do not accept outward baptism by r, saying that water only washes off the eanness of the external body. The com- ion of the body and blood of Christ in the of bread and wine they do not accept; ng that bread and wine enter into the th like ordinary food; and are of no avail e soul.

e society of the Spirit Wrestlers was origi- a dispersed one. Nowhere did they at form communities, but they lived, a few lies in various villages, through almost whole of Russia. They were banished by Russian government from places where were formerly settled, to Transcaucasia, the Turkish frontier. Others were planted e present government of Elisavetpol. They always regularly paid State taxes and led their other social duties, but as soon uestion has been raised as to principle and ns which in any way touch their religious , there has been at once disclosed a com- difference from other peasantry. They r frequent the churches; do not worship im- ; do not keep the ordinary fasts, and take rt in the recreations and loose pleasures orldly people. They deem all externalism in the work of salvation utterly useless, and therefore acknowledge one sacred, universal and apostolic Church, which the Lord by his coming has assembled, consecrated and replenished by the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and which is the union of all faithful and true Christians. At their religious meetings each one may express what he knows or feels for the benefit of his brethren, and the women are not excluded from this. They have no personal property, but each regards his property as belonging to all. Each takes from the common stock that which he needs. They take nothing from travellers who stop at their houses, either for lodging or food, but they have been accustomed to erect a special lodging house, where chance travellers must put up, so that their community may not be depraved by evil example. They are compassionate even to household animals, and almost entirely refrain from killing them.

Respect from children to parents is strictly observed, and in general from younger men to those older, though the latter, and even parents, do not appropriate to themselves any ascendancy over the younger ones, regarding themselves as spiritually their equals.

There exists no punishment among the brethren. As soon as a brother thinks another has behaved improperly, he, according to the precise gospel instruction, reminds him that he is acting wrongly; if the one at fault will not take consideration, he is admonished in the presence of two or three of the brethren; if he does not take heed of them, he is invited to appear before the general assembly. There have been cases, though very seldom, in which some of the brethren have left the society, in order to live at liberty according to their unrestricted desire. It has even happened that wives have deserted their husbands. The husbands in such cases, do not detain their wives, but give them liberty, at the same time giving them means to live upon. Deserters may however be again accepted into the society if they completely repent and leave their immoral life.

The general round of occupations is filled by each taking a calling. The tradesman attends to commercial business, and the agriculturist works on the land. But the majority of them give preference to agriculture.

They have no written or printed regulations for their communities, which it might be supposed would lead to disagreement or disorder; yet no such disorder has ever been noticed. Parents watch over the conduct of their children, correct their faults, and teach them the Divine law. When a father dies, his place is taken by the elder of the brothers; and in the case of incapacity of the latter, his place is assumed by the one next capable. And here it may not be out of place to mention an incident which occurred during a religious gathering at Yorkton. A First-day school superintendent who was present addressed the assembled Dukhobors, and at the conclusion of his remarks, asked: "But do you teach your children?" A patriarch Dukhobor, upwards of eighty, without making direct reply, called for his grandson, a little lad of six. The child was brought into the midst of the assembly, when the grandfather requested him to repeat the ten commandments. This he did without faltering, and no further answer to the inquiry seemed needful.

The system of education among the Dukhobors is simple and uniform. As soon as the child begins to speak and understand, his parents commence verbally to teach him prayers and psalms, and to tell him something out of the Scriptures; and they thus continue to instruct him in Christian doctrine. When children have learned a few prayers and psalms they accompany their elders to the meetings, recite in their turn what they have learned, and chant psalms with the others. Not only the parents, but every Spirit-Wrestler regards it as a duty to teach every child something useful whenever he has the opportunity to do so, and to keep him from evil whenever he has occasion. Owing to such education, the spirit of the parents by degrees passes into the children; their ways of thinking take deep root, and the tendency towards good is most strongly encouraged by good examples.

Loyalty to Mother.—It has been well said, that whenever you find an instance of success, you will find that success based upon substantial qualities of mind and heart. There is no one quality that will insure a man's success more than loyalty to his mother, because the qualities that produce success are largely the outgrowth of such loyalty. It is the foundation of manhood.

Let me cite two instances where great Americans are noted for that loyalty. First, James A. Garfield, who, when he took the oath on assuming the office of President of the United States, standing in the presence of a great throng that witnessed the inaugural ceremonies, kissed the Bible, and then turned and kissed his mother. Kissing his mother was something that never had been done under similar circumstances, and it won for him the warmest expression of admiration.

What greater lesson has been taught American youth than of President McKinley's loyalty to his mother? He who holds the highest office in the gift of seventy millions of free and enlightened people, laid aside the duties of his great office to go time and again from the seat of government to the bedside of his mother in her humble Ohio home. With all the responsibility upon him no member of the mother's household watched more tenderly or more prayerfully at her side than he. It was one duty his big heart would not entrust to another.

It is a sad fact that the American youth lacks much of the love he should bear his mother. You may be grown to manhood in years, but your mother gave you more care during the first five years in your life than you have given her in all the years since. There is nothing equals a mother's care during the first five years of her child's life, when it is the most helpless little creature on earth. There is no sacrifice she will not make for it.—Exchange.

Items Concerning the Society.

Job S. Gidley left his home in North Dartmouth, Mass., on the 23rd instant, on a proposed visit to the Dukhobors in Manitoba. On reaching the Canadian Pacific Railroad he expected to meet with Eliza H. Varney of Bloomfield, Ontario, who has been liberated to visit the same people.

We learn that Enoch Carter and wife and Ida Chamness arrived in Liverpool, Eng., on or about the 7th instant. They had pleasant weather on the voyage, and no sea-sickness, and their strength seemed improved.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES. The State Department made public the substance of reports received from Commissioner Denby and General Otis, which contradict the statements of the correspondents as to the condition of affairs in the Philippines. From these it appears that the experiment of establishing municipal government for the towns in Cavite and Manila has been a great success; that a number of ports have been opened to trade and "a disposition to accept American sovereignty" is everywhere manifested; that the only large force of the rebels which holds together is about 4,000 in Tarlac province and northern Pampanga, and that "the only hope of the insurgent leaders is in aid from the United States;" and that this is the influence which enables them to hold out.

The letters addressed to the President average 1,200 a day. Eighty per cent. of them never reach the eye of either the Chief Executive or his private secretary. They are sorted by the clerks under the direction of Private Secretary Porter and sent to the proper departments for attention. The largest proportion of the letters ask for financial assistance. The next largest number pray for the President's assistance in purely personal matters.

The resignation of Russel A. Alger, as Secretary of War, has been accepted, and Elihu Root, the celebrated New York lawyer, has been appointed his successor.

The trade of the United States with New South Wales in staple articles has increased 127 per cent. in five years.

The customs receipts at this port for the year ending Sixth Month 30th amounted to $22,387,642.43. For the year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1898, the total receipts were $12,602,172.81.

New York leads all the States in the production of paper, Massachusetts is second, and Pennsylvania fifth.

In Pennsylvania fifty-nine firms are engaged in the manufacture of paper, operating sixty-five mills. The capital invested amounts to $12,000,000, and the annual value of the product is $6,800,000.

California has now about 30,000 acres of olive trees. Two-thirds of them are not yet bearing fruit, but it is estimated that in five years California will be able to supply the market for the United States.

Eighty-four per cent. of the entire State of Idaho is still public land, amounting to more than 44,000,000 acres. Of this area it has been estimated by the Government Geological Survey that 7,000,000 acres can be irrigated successfully.

A phenomenal demand for peanuts has resulted in an advance of 100 per cent. in the price thereof, and it is estimated that at the new quotations the 1899 crop will be worth between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. A comparatively small district in Virginia will profit by the advance.

George B. Loving, of Texas, who is organizing the $40,000,000 cattle syndicate, will attend a meeting of the company in New York on the 29th to underwrite the stock of the company.

The great crater Mokua-Weowea, on the peak of Mauna-Loa, Island of Hawaii, has broken into active eruption, according to advices received in San Francisco by the America Maru, and a lava flow, throwing fire into the air to the height of hundreds of feet, has started down the mountain side toward the city of Hilo. This is the first time in eighteen years that the great crater of Mauna-Loa has shown signs of activity. The present eruption promises to be the most notable in the recent history of the mountain, and the damage done will be almost incalculable. Already Hilo is threatened, and the Volcano House is right in the track of the lava flow. If some agency does not turn the fiery flood no power can save the historic hotel. All about the base of Mauno-Loa too are cane fields and coffee plantations and these the burning lava will lick up in its course.

There were 510 deaths in this city last week, which is 28 more than the previous week and 13 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 163 were under one year of age; 279 were males and 231 females; 73 died of cholera infantum; 69 of consumption; 33 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 31 of marasmus; 27 of heart diseases; 19 of nephritis; 17 of pneumonia; 17 of cancer; 15 of convulsions; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of old age; 13 from casualties; 11 of apoplexy, and 10 of Bright's disease.

No. 2 mixed corn, 36½ a 36⅞c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 31 a 31½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5⅜ a 5½c.; good, 5¼ a 5⅜c.; medium, 5¼ a 5⅜c.; common, 4¾ a 5c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 a 5¼c.; good, 4½ a 4⅝c.; medium, 4 a 4¼c.; com., 2¾ a 3¾c.; spring lambs, 4½ a 7c.

HOGS.—Western, 6¼ a 6⅜c., according to quality.

FOREIGN. To London, as to almost every large city, the question of a water supply has been a serious problem. Londoners now see a way to solve it. The Engineer of the County Council has informed that body underneath London is an immense lake, in a chalk basin 2500 square miles in extent. The annual rainfall that sinks to this lake, 100 feet below the surface of the ground, amounts to 280,000,000,000 gallons, which would give a daily yield of 767,000,000 gallons. An artesian well has already tapped the lake at Clapham, and it is pointed out that all that is necessary to insure a water supply is to sink a sufficient number of wells. The wonder is that London should have existed for more than 2000 years and never discovered that the great lake was beneath it.

London banks paid out $20,000,000 in dividends on Seventh Month 1. New York banks are said to have paid ten times that.

The British Admiralty announces that England will continue to maintain a naval power equal to that of France and Russia. Thirty-four articles of the arbitration scheme were adopted at The Hague Peace Congress on the 20th inst., and the firing of explosives from balloons will be prohibited during hostile engagements.

Hamburg is still the wealthiest city in Germany. There are as many as 136,872 payers of income taxes, although all those whose income is under 900 marks are exempt. Last week has been unusually hot and humid in Germany. Heavy rains and hailstorms have occurred in various parts of the country, inflicting much damage to the crops. Many people have been killed by lightning, two such cases having occurred in Berlin, where also a number were injured. The River Havel at Potsdam was filled to its bank for several days, and thousands of fish were killed by lightning. Floods have been in the Spreewald, and in the lowlands of the Vistula the hay crop has been ruined for the second time this season. In Wurtemberg the crops have been almost totally destroyed. The thunder at Hanover was the most severe experienced for thirty years. Many people in that province were struck and killed by lightning. In Riesingebirge, Silesia, some deaths from sunstroke were also reported. One hundred draught dogs in Berlin were sunstruck during the week and brought to the veterinary station by the police.

The Scientific American says: Utopia is now known to be located at Oneida, in Sweden. The community has, in course of a generation, sold $1,600,000 worth of trees, and by means of judicious replanting has provided for a similar income every thirty or forty years. In consequence of this commercial wealth there are no taxes. Railways, telephones, etc., are free, and so are school houses, teaching, and many other things.

A mysterious epidemic, which has been prevailing recently among the cattle on the island of Gothland, has spread to the human beings in the district, and a large number of patients have been admitted to the hospitals. Some of the cases are extremely difficult to diagnose. Cattle are dying by hundreds throughout the island as a result of the epidemic.

Mount Ætna is in eruption, and following the phenomena earthquake shocks have occurred in Italy doing some damage.

Japan has a new lighthouse made of bamboo, which is said to resist the waves better than any kind of wood.

Although the average rainfall in Sixth Month at Manila is 14½ inches, the precipitation for the last twenty days has been 41 inches. General Otis reports that the whole country is flooded, and that the troops on the outposts have suffered in consequence.

The results of recent drillings in Borneo have caused many persons to think that Borneo will prove to be the richest petroleum field in the world.

The ports of New South Wales are the freest on the globe, and in none of the Australian colonies are there any discriminating or differential duties.

The South African Republic has adopted articles of the Franchise law enabling sons of Outlanders to become naturalized at the age of 16, and to obtain the franchise five years thereafter, and the concession will, it is understood, avert troubles with Great Britain.

The storm in Santiago de Chili, mentioned in the despatch to the Associated Press on Seventh Month 18, still continued. The damage to rail and bridges is estimated at 6,000,000 pesos. The wheat crop, it is believed, has been completely destroyed.

Women do the mining at Colombia. No man with any self respect can be induced to engage in that occupation, because in Spanish times it was the work of slaves.

United States Consul Jenkins, at San Salvador, has reported to the State Department by cable that San Salvador is in a state of siege, as the result of revolution plotting.

Nearly 32,000 immigrants entered Canada last year, whom 9,475 were from England and 9,119 from the United States.

One hundred and nine thousand locomotives are at present running in various countries.

Study in Inconsistency; and a Letter from Whittier.

A visitor to many meetings conducted under name of Friends writes his impressions as ows: "To profess the old profession of ends, that of Divine and immediate guidance the Spirit, and in method and practice vio- the profession in every turn of variety in r religious 'service,' which is entirely con- led by a human instrument, is to make a kery of the most divinely spiritual item in ancient faith of Friends. They seem to sist in this method with a sort of fatalistic lessness. They seem as if conscious that method has lost its power. But as they e by following it lost all they had, it is a essity that they keep it up. It is this or ing. The method so practised is perfunc- , as devoid of life as can well be imagined. different is its effect on themselves or the ic from what it was twenty years ago when ossessed the attraction and enthusiasm of ty, that it seemed to me as if it was an ct to extract substance from a 'squeezed on,' and that they were more than half cious of it themselves."

t the same time a letter comes to us from ged Friend, as follows:

e had the privilege of some correspondence with ifted poet, John G. Whittier. In his last letter, ten only about one month before his decease, rites: "I have read with interest the account e death and funeral of Morris Cope. He was of the old school of Friends, and faithfully tained the great cardinal doctrine of the So- , which so many of its members seem to have ely lost sight of. It is a painful sight to see e Yearly Meetings going back to the very things which our early Friends separated from. I am comforted by the belief that the best men of other denominations are drawing nearer to the Truth as held by our ancestors; and I know that the falling back of so many of those who still bear our name is greatly regretted by them." This is the very truth. At another time he used language equally regretful, and added "that if our Society proved unfaithful in the upholding of the principles and testimonies committed to us to bear before the world, that they would not be suffered to fall to the ground, "that others would be called in to support and carry them forward to the final triumph."

Search the Scriptures Rightly.

Consider whether the Scripture be your rule or no? that is, whether in singleness of heart ye wait on the Lord, to open the Scriptures by his spirit, and to keep out your carnal reason from thence (which cannot understand them, but will be wresting them, and making them speak as it would have them); or whether ye take scope to search into them with that part, which ever was shut out from the right knowledge of them. "The natural man understandeth not the things of the spirit of God."

The spirit of the Lord alone understandeth the meaning of his own words and He alone gives the understanding of them, which He gives not to the wise searcher and disputer nor to the prudent professor (Mat. xi: 25), but to the babe which He begets, to which He gives the kingdom, and opens the words which the Scripture speaks concerning the kingdom. "The wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God;" and in that search into the Scriptures, it will gather only a knowledge suitable to its enmity.

Thus the Jews were great enemies, and strong enemies, by the knowledge which they gathered out of the Scriptures written to them; and the same spirit hath also wound itself into the Scriptures written since: and as then, that spirit fought against Christ and his apostles, with those very Scriptures which the spirit of Christ had formerly written; so the same spirit fights now against the lambs of Christ, with the Scriptures which were written since. Yea, the great stronghold of antichrist at this day, is Scripture interpreted by the fleshly wisdom: for antichrist comes not in a direct denial of Christ or Scriptures (He is too cunning to be found there), but bends them aside by the fleshly wisdom to serve the fleshly will, and thus undermines the Spirit and exalts the flesh, by a fleshly understanding and interpretation of those very Scriptures which were written by the Spirit against the flesh. And through this mistake it is, that some innocently cry up things practised at the first springing up of truth, not seeing of what nature they were and upon what account they were done, and what of them were cast off by the same Spirit which before had led to the use of them, through Scripture expressly testifieth thereof. For, (Rev. xi: 1, 2) there was the measuring of the building which God's own Spirit had built, part whereof was reserved for God, part given to the Gentiles, or uncircumcised in heart, who are now the Gentiles, since the breaking down of the former distinction betwixt Jew and Gentile. That which God reserved for himself was "the altar, the temple, the worshippers therein," all these are inward. The outward court was given to the Gentiles, to those who would be worshippers under the gospel, and yet had not the circumcision of the gospel; to them the court which is without the temple is given; and this they get and cry up, and tread under foot the holy city, trampling upon the inward, and undervaluing it. Christ within, the spirit within, the law within, the power within, becomes a reproach; and this they have the power to do, even to keep down the inward, and cry up the outward, and to persecute and slay the witnesses whom God raised up to testify for the inward and against the outward (as it is now in the Gentiles' hands, and made use of by them to keep down the inward); and so the building being thus taken down, the church flies out of it into the wilderness. . . .

Many cry up the Scriptures for their rule; but which of them is taught by the Spirit to keep the carnal part out of the Scriptures? Which of them keeps out their own will and understanding, receiving their knowledge of Scripture from that Spirit which wrote them? Do not men rather gather a knowledge in the flesh and then grow strong and wise, and able to dispute and confident in their own way, and become fierce despisers of those who cannot own their interpretation of these Scriptures? and thus the mind of God, the true meaning of the Scriptures is not their rule; but an image which they have formed out of it; a meaning which their wit hath strongly imagined and fenced with arguments, and the real mind and intent of the Spirit is hid from them. So by this means many both deceive their own souls and help to deceive the souls of others, missing of the plainness and simplicity of the Spirit and gathering senses in the wit and subtlety of the fleshly part, where the serpentine wisdom lodgeth and twines about the tree of knowledge. Now what do these men do? whom do they serve? and whither do they run themselves and lead many other poor souls whom they pretend to be helpful to save?

THE sign and singular effect of inward baptism is the answer of a good conscience towards God.

I AM not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. (Rom. i: 16.)

Offered to THE FRIEND by Mary E. Morris, Chester Hill, Ohio.

She was born at Middletown, Bucks County, in the year 1730-1. Under the pious care of her parents, and through the visitation of Divine Grace, she early became acquainted with the seasoning virtue thereof, which made her willing to submit to the Cross of Christ, and to follow Him in the way of his leadings, whereby she was preserved from many of the vanities and follies incident to youth. In the year 1748 she was married, and having a large family of children, she was careful to bring them up in plainness and industry. Her husband departed this life the tenth of the Ninth Month, in the year 1775, about which times he appeared in the ministry, and being faithful, grew in her gift, was sound in doctrine, accompanied with a degree of heart-tendering authority. She travelled at sundry times into divers parts of the adjacent provinces, with Friends' approbation, and was often engaged in the service of visiting Friends' families to good satisfaction.

She removed within the compass of Horsham Monthly Meeting in the year 1792, and some time after, bodily infirmities began to increase upon her, yet her zeal for the cause of Truth and righteousness did not abate. She was a diligent attender of our religious meetings, both for worship and discipline, and a lively example, when there, by humbly waiting for the arising of the power of Truth, and not being forward in her public appearances. In the time of her last illness, she was much afflicted with bodily pain, which she bore with exemplary patience and resignation. She was often concerned that her children might be preserved in obedience to the manifestations of Divine grace, speaking of the example of our Saviour, and how He often retired from the multitudes into the mountains and solitary places, and spent much of his time in prayer and meditation, she exhorted her children often to retire to the house of prayer, and to delight in inward retirement of mind. At another time, when a friend was sitting by her, she appeared to be in supplication to the Lord, but with such a low voice, that not many words could be distinctly understood. Sometime after she said, "Oh, the severe pain that I feel, but, if it will hasten this poor tabernacle one step toward the grave, what matter if I can but be preserved in the patience until the end come, where my soul may be at rest in the inclosure of that quiet habitation, where there will be no more saying, 'I am sick.' At another time, she said, "O Lord, shake terribly, shake all the delights of this world, and turn the people's minds more and more to seek thy Truth," then spoke in a few words, setting forth the goodness of the Lord, and said, "Oh, death, where is thy sting. Oh grave, where is thy victory? Where there is no fear, there is no sting." Sometime after, said to her daughter, "Give me up; let me go and do not hold me. I must go. I have given up the world, and all that is therein, and am fully resigned to leave it." And at another time, when in much bodily pain, she said, "Oh Thou, that hast been with me in six troubles, leave me not in the seventh." She often appeared to be offering up praises and thanksgivings to the Lord, and through all her afflictions of body, she appeared to be firmly fixed on the immovable Rock, Christ Jesus, and her hope and confidence unshaken, that there was a place of rest prepared for her among the righteous, into which we doubt not she is entered.

She departed this life, in love and unity with her friends and neighbors, on the twenty-eighth of the First Month, 1796, without sigh or groan, aged sixty-five years, a minister about twenty years, and was interred in Friends' burying ground at Byberry on the thirty-first of the same, at which time a solemn meeting was held.

"THOU CALLEST ME FRIEND."—There are a good many incidents reported from the war that encourage, in the midst of discouragement, the hope that, after all, "man's inhumanity to man" is not on the decline. Here is an incident reported in a letter from the American camp at Santiago, a few days after the hard fighting there, at the beginning of the siege. The correspondent said:

"While all these wounded were being cared for at Siboney, the Spanish wounded were not being neglected. It is impossible to say that the Spaniards are not brave fighters, after once seeing the bearing of their wounded as they fell into the hands of our men. Every man of them fully expected to be massacred on the spot. Here is one instance:

"One morning, near General Shafter's headquarters, a dozen wounded Spaniards were having there wounds dressed. One young fellow, who was shot through both legs, lay on the ground. The surgeon was trying to ask him to move his leg so that his boot could be unlaced, when Charles Pepper, the Washington correspondent, volunteered to act as interpreter. Stooping down to the Spaniard, he gave the message, and, as is the Spanish custom, he prefaced his remark with 'Amigo.' Instantly the young Spaniard's face lightened with amazement and delight. He grasped C. Pepper by the hand and exclaimed incredulously, 'Thou callest me friend!'

"C. Pepper explained the remark to the two other correspondents with him; and when they too, shook hands with the Spaniard, and helped the surgeon to unlace his shoes, it was really a study to watch the surprised expressions of the other Spaniards."—Commonwealth.

THOROUGH command of the three R's is secured to the pupil only by constant vigilance. No occasional practice of them will at all suffice. Alike in the secondary and in the elementary school, during every moment of the sessions, writing, spelling, speaking, composition, expression, ciphering, must be under sleepless inspection. Every exercise, every recitation, every laboratory report, should be a double test: of the pupil's knowledge of the topic itself, of his skill with the tools by which he makes that knowledge evident. Hardly a skilled career can be imagined in which such early vigilance will not be repaid a thousand-fold.—James P. Munroe.

"THERE is such a thing as a very small gift in a great many words; and there is such a thing as a large gift in a very few words. We do not want an eloquent ministry; we do not want a flowery ministry; we want a living ministry; we want a baptizing ministry—a ministry that will break a hard heart, and heal a broken one; a ministry that will lead us to the fou tain, and leave us there."—*Wm. The Unrevised Version as a Masterpiece o Literature.

FROM A LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Aside from the doctrinal standpoint, I thi the Revised Version is not to be compared wi the King James version. Edwin Markham.

(Author of "The Man with the Hoe" and other poems.)

A distinct surprise has been offered to the Anglo-Saxon world within the present year by the rise of a new poet upon the Pacific coast. His remarkable appeal to the fortunate classes of the world in behalf of labor, surrounded by conditions of distress and privation, and confined within these for life, in the great poem, "The Man with the Hoe," has aroused the attention of thinking men wherever that poem has been seen. It appeared on the eighth of last Month last in The San Francisco Examiner and produced a sensation unparalleled since the publication of "The Recessional." This poem, however, is not so much in the nature of the awakening of the Nation to consider its responsibility and its guilt towards other Peoples, as it is to rouse the public conscience wherever it may be led within its own domain to study and relieve that distress of the poor which arises from no fault of their own.

(Charles) Edwin Markham is a native of Oregon, Oregon, born Fourth Month 23rd, 1852, and to a marked extent what is so frequently termed "A self made man." On his father's side, he descends from noted Pennsylvania Ancestry, namely Colonel William Markham, the cousin of William Penn and his secretary; appointed also Deputy Governor for Pennsylvania during Penn's absence in England and subsequently Deputy Governor of Delaware in 1691. Still later, Colonel Markham was associated with Lord Baltimore in important public affairs. He was, indeed, a member of the Church of England, yet he agreed with his Quaker cousin in "non resistance and the rights of the masses."

The Markham family had already attained considerable celebrity in England—another William Markham having been a graduate of Christ Church College, Oxford, Dean of Westminster, Bishop of Chester and tutor to the Prince of Wales in the time of Edmund Burke. He was distinguished for "a vigorous mind and profound learning."

On the mother's side, our poet is descended from the Winchells, a family also of considerable repute, both in England and on the Continent. This family showed the faith that was in them by taking refuge in Holland from the persecution in England, by which the Friends suffered, rather than desert or deny their religious beliefs.

The Winchells were, in no sense, of Quaker blood or connection, and they made their mark in the colonial history of this country, the Revolutionary War and the Civil War. But in addition to this, this family "has been noted for intellectual vigor and aggressive activity in the affairs of church and state; many representatives having been noted as legislators, preachers and scientists and in other learned professions."

The parents of Edwin Markham were pioneers who crossed the plains from Michigan to the Pacific coast, shortly before his birth. His father died before he reached his fifth year, and his mother and her family settled in "a rich and beautiful valley near Suisun, in Central California," where he grew to young manhood, devoted to every kind of labor required on a modern cattle ranch, and depending for education on the rude country schools and his own ceaseless reading." His elder brother was deaf and dumb, and his mother a stern and silent woman, of strong character and great originality, and these were the chief associates of the growing boy. His tastes and his reading were largely poetical: "Homer and Byron being his first masters."

Edwin Markham entered the State Normal School at San Jose, in 1871, "making his way on money he had earned," and then pursued the classical course of Christian College at Santa Rosa, California.

For awhile he studied law, but he has never practised. Hitherto he has been chiefly known by his work in the service of education and the progress of California, by occupying the position of Superintendent and Principal of schools at various places. To-day he is "Head Master of the Tompkins Observation School, connected with the University of California, where he has been engaged for a number of years in work which is highly significant to the interests of academic education. Professor Markham's library is acknowledged one of the best chosen in the State, and is especially excellent in the department of philosophy and literary criticism."

In relation to his poetry, I shall not assume the function of a critic, which presupposes a native quality to which I make no claim, and an art, the result of labor and practice in which I have no experience. I will, however, say I think that the most of the readers who will for the first time take his poems into their hands will be impressed very much as I have been, both with the poetical faculty which they indicate, a thing, "not made but born," the sweetness of their tone, and the devotional feeling which is to be found in so many of them.

A poet who writes of the sufferings of his fellow man must needs have something of the Baptist's utterance, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness." If that cry have nothing personal or selfish in it, but is an appeal evoked by sympathy for other men, then there is in it a nobility which deserves the general respect and acknowledgment.

A book of poems, his first, has just appeared from the press with the title, "The Man with the Hoe and other Poems."

In this collection there is a sweetness and a beauty which are seldom surpassed. There is a suggestion of Robert Herrick and of William Morris in some of these: but of a William Morris with an unconcealed faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. No recent poetry of which I have knowledge passes in these qualities "The Two Taverns" and "The Prayer."

But, probably that characteristic of his poems which will vibrate the longest in the souls of men is that sweet charity which makes the wrongs of others his own, and which appeals for justice on behalf of the oppressed who have found for themselves no voice. In his "Desire of Nations" he anticipates for Him of whom Isaiah speaks as "The Wonderful Counsellor," upon whose shoulders the "government shall be," that He is coming > ——"to make the long injustice right,— > ——to push back the shadows of the night,—

> The grey tradition full of flint and flaw:"— and less than this we cannot hope for from the loving Lord who wills not that "any should perish," whether from cruel environment and hereditary wrongs, or from themselves going astray.

"THE MAN WITH THE HOE."

BY EDWIN MARKHAM.

"God made man in his own image, in the image of God made He him."—Genesis.

Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans
Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
The emptiness of ages in his face,
And on his back the burden of the world.
Who made him dead to rapture and despair,
A thing that grieves not and that never hopes,
Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox?
Who loosened and let down this brutal jaw?
Whose was the hand that slanted back this brow?
Whose breath blew out the light within this brain?

Is this the Thing the Lord God made and gave
To have dominion over sea and land;
To trace the stars and search the heavens for power;
To feel the passion of Eternity?
Is this the Dream He dreamed who shaped the suns
And pillared the blue firmament with light?
Down all the stretch of Hell to its last gulf
There is no shape more terrible than this—
More tongued with censure of the world's blind greed—
More filled with signs and portents for the soul—
More fraught with menace to the universe.

What gulfs between him and the seraphim!
Slave of the wheel of labor, what to him
Are Plato and the swing of Pleiades?
What the long reaches of the peaks of song,
The rift of dawn, the reddening of the rose!
Through this dread shape the suffering ages look;
Time's tragedy is in that aching stoop;
Through this dread shape Humanity betrayed,
Plundered, profaned and disinherited,
Cries protest to the Judges of the World,
A protest that is also prophecy.

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands,
Is this the handiwork you give to God,
This monstrous thing distorted and soul-quenched?
How will you ever straighten up this shape;
Touch it again with immortality;
Give back the upward looking and the light;
Rebuild in it the music and the dream;
Make right the immemorial infamies,
Perfidious wrongs, immedicable woes!

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands,
How will the Future reckon with this Man?
How answer his brute question in that hour
When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world?
How will it be with kingdoms and with kings—
With those who shaped him to the thing he is—
When this dumb Terror shall reply to God
After the silence of the centuries?

THE TWO TAVERNS.

I remember how I lay,
On a bank a summer's day,
Peering into weed and flower,
Watched a poppy all one hour,
Watched it till the air grew chill,
In the darkness of the hill,
Till I saw a wild bee dart,
Out of the cold to the poppy's heart,
Saw the petals gently spin,
And shut the little lodger in.
Then I took the quiet road,
To my own secure abode.
All night long his tavern hung,
Now it rested, now it swung—
I asleep in steadfast tower,
He asleep in stirring flower,
In our hearts the same delight,
In the hushes of the night,
Over us both the same dear care,
As we slumbered unaware.

Silence in our Meetings.

The letter by two Friends on "Silence in Friends' meetings" brings forward a very important matter, one on which it is rightly said many of the younger Friends feel deeply. The need for rest and retirement to the higher plane is increasingly felt in the growing rush of outside business, and the service in silence is a most precious heritage in the hands of the Society of Friends, which requires constant guarding in right use.

There is, however, a second manner of looking at it, which is, I venture to think, desirable to consider, in order rightly to appreciate its value from the intellectual point of view. Many of the younger Friends have been educated in the modern scientific spirit, and although the spiritual facts at the back are ever the same, the expression of these facts in a manner to which they are trained will appeal to them with a force which cannot always be equalled by the expression of the same facts in the old phraseology; so that a statement and consideration of the value of silence from this point of view will serve, perhaps, to emphasize its statement from the other. As was well remarked by F. B. Meyer, at Devonshire House, "the action of the inward Spirit itself has laws, and if one will become sufficiently humble to merge one's own will in that of the Divine or inward and shining Spirit, the will of oneself and the will of the inward Spirit will become one." . . . By going along the lines of its action or flow, work, and that a great work, can be done by simply obeying and following its impulse.

The action of silent waiting is a right method for obtaining this influx of the highest Spirit into the mind; and the interference of its action at an early stage of the meeting is therefore not good. The gradual effects on the inner feelings are quite marked, and there is no want of reverence in naming them with the object of endeavoring to follow the law of the action of the inward Spirit.

The closing of the outward doors and the quietness of the room, filled as it is with men and women whose hearts and brains are all intensely active, has a peculiar and solemn effect. The quietness is deep, intense; the trials and cares and worries of the world drop away, leaving a place for the coming of an inward peace, which itself comes from the submission of the thoughts to the Highest, and the control under and identification with the Divine (or shining) self, the light within. But for many—for most indeed, until the control by the highest can become a constant life—the interval is filled with a surging wave and ebb and flow of feelings; this gradually quiets down, and the bowl is filled higher and higher until that fulness of inner force is felt which is meant by the phrase being "moved with the Spirit." This surging and ebb and flow may vary indefinitely; or it may be quite wasted by turning the thoughts outward, to business, stocks and shares, pleasure, profit, or weariness. But turned inward towards what is high and what is good and what is bright and shining, the force of the spirit from below meets that from above and is transformed up to the steady shining of the "inward light;" and this is the one great fact of which the Society is a jealous guardian.

By habit of contemplation and devotion to the highest Spirit from childhood to youth and mature age, a regular order is doubtless established in this spiritual influx which, without want of reverence, can be noticed and named. If the life in the previous week has been wrong, there is darkness and misery and anguish of spirit; if the life has been good and fruitful, immediate presence of the inner feeling of light. But even if free from active evil, there will always be some feeling of failure; so that almost inevitably the first stage in the quiet silence is one of question, failure, pleading, perhaps of fear and the asking of pardon. Then will come the knowledge that the inner and higher life is [always] there within, ready to help; and a quiet dwelling on the inexhaustible force within is like the filling of a reservoir, during which time hope and trust and belief in the higher Spirit is the constant inner feeling. Then comes the third stage, of joy and peace and love, when the force of the Spirit rises within to what may be thought of as a "blazing light," irradiating the whole mind and body, and sending forth rays of love and devotion to the highest, around the room, around the place, around the world. This is the contact with the Divine—the inner light. The meeting-house, as the letter quoted says, "seems almost filled with celestial fire." Nay, may we not say "is filled?" for this inward light, is it not a real light of another kind, palpable to the inward minds of those who are there, lifting the body and thoughts upwards to its very highest ideal? If so, then this beautiful action must be allowed its time to occur. Even with previous preparation, in coming to the meeting ready and expectant, it may require half an hour or so of silent waiting to go through its baptism of fire up to light, through fear and hope to joy and love; so therefore if those in the room know of the needs of its action, will they not be more ready to wait in silence until the power of the highest Spirit be able to make itself heard in the stillness with profit and help, and for strength for the coming week?

I have often thought that this manner of thinking of the need of silence might be very helpful, and especially so to some of the younger Friends, as it has been to thine truly.

GREAT WORLD RAILWAYS.—"Within three years," says the Fortnightly Review, "a man will be able to get into the train at Ostend and travel straight through to Port Arthur. In five years a person will be able to travel in a railway carriage from the Cape of Good Hope to Alexandria. There is yet a third great world-line from Constantinople via Palestine, Persia, India and Burmah, to Hong Kong. The importance of these three great lines of communication cannot be sufficiently dwelt upon, it can certainly not be exaggerated. With the Siberian railway we have nothing to do now; with regard to the other two this is to be noted: they both of them meet in Palestine. Palestine is the great centre, the meeting of the roads. Whoever holds Palestine commands the great lines of communication, not only by land, but also by sea."

Is this the highway of which the prophet Isaiah speaks? (Isa. xix: 22-25.)

THE letter killeth, the Spirit giveth life. (2 Cor. iv: 10.)

THE LAW WRITTEN IN THE HEART.—In word, this writing of the law in the he makes obedience a natural motive; I mean, a new nature. It springs not from outwa constraints and precepts, but from an inwa principle, and, therefore, not only is it univ sal and constant, but cheerful and easy. T law written in tables of stone only is hard a grievous; but make once the heart the table it, and there is nothing more pleasing. T law of God makes service delightful, even t painfulest of it. "I delight to do thy will, my God; yea, thy law is within my heart." T sun, which moves with such wonderful swiftn that to the ignorant it would seem incredi to hear how many thousands of miles it g each hour, yet because it is naturally fitted that course, it comes, as the psalmist spea "Like a bridegroom forth from his chamb and rejoices as a strong man to run a rac If the natural man be convinced of the go ness and equity of the law of God, yet beca it is not written within, but only comma without, it is a violent motion to him to ob it, and therefore he finds it a painful yoke. I hear David, in whose heart it was, speak of how doth he call it his delight and his joy.

If any profane person object to a godly m his exact life, that it is too precise, as if wrote each action before he did it, he may swer, as Demosthenes did to him that objec he wrote his orations before he spake th that he was not at all ashamed of that, altho they were not only written but engraven forehand. Certainly the godly man lives this law which is written and engraven on heart, and he need not be ashamed of it.—A bishop Leighton.

Others of G. F's persuasion now began to each publicly, viz: Thomas Aldam, Richard rnsworth, and not long after, William Dewsry. This made such a stir, that the priest Warnsworth procured a warrant against G. and T. A. The constable took T. A. to York, he meddled not with G. F., saying he was th to trouble men that were strangers.

At a steeple-house not far from Bradford, G. showed the people the priest's unfair deal; and directing them to Christ, the true inrd teacher, declared that God was come to ch his people himself, and to bring them off m all the world's teachers and hirelings, that y might come to receive freely from Him.

passed from thence without much opposin, and travelled now for some time with hard Farnsworth.

Then parting from him, he came to Wentdale, and had not much opposition there. us he went from place to place, and often t with strange occurrences, some of which re more jocose than serious; others very le, and even dangerous to his life. But he sted in God, really believing that He had t him to preach repentance, and to exhort ple to a true conversion. Near Sedbergh went to a meeting at Justice Benson's, where people met that were separated from the blic worship, and by his preaching, he gave h general satisfaction, that most of the rers were convinced of the truth, declared him. Thus the number of his fellow-bers increased so, that now they had meets by themselves in many places of the coun. G. F. declared the day of the Lord through fair (at Sedbergh) and afterwards went into steeple-house yard, where abundance of ple came to him. Here he preached for eral hours. None of the priests, several of om were there, spoke against what he had lared; but a captain said, "Why will ye not into the church? for this is not a fit place preach in." G. F. told him that he did not rove of their church. Then stood up Francis vgill, who was a preacher, and though he er had seen G. F. before, was so affected, he answered the captain, and soon put to silence, for, said F. H., "this man speaks authority, and not as the scribes." After G. F. opened to the people, that that und and house were not more holy than ther place; and that "the house was not the rch, but the people whom Christ was the d of." Near Firbank chapel in Westmore, having refreshed himself at noon with a e water out of a brook, he went and sat n on the top of a rock hard by, intending ave a meeting there. In the afternoon, the ple gathered about him, with several r preachers, and amongst these F. H. and Audland. To this auditory, which was ged to consist of more than a thousand ple, G. F. spoke about the space of three rs. His ministry was at that time accomed by such a convincing power, and so hed the hearts of the people, that many, even all the teachers of that congregation convinced of the Truth declared to them. fter this meeting was over, G. F. went to 's, who as well as F. H., had been quite ght over by his effectual preaching. And so far from approving their former service, that they gave back the money they received for their preaching to the parish of Colton in Lancashire; being now resolved to give freely, what they had received freely.

G. F. coming to Kendal had a meeting there, in the town hall; where, declaring the word of life, several became convinced of the Truth published by him, when he went to Under-Barrow: several people accompanied him, and he had great reasonings with them, but especially with one Edward Burrough, who, though of extraordinary parts, and acquired knowledge, was not able to withstand the efficacious sayings of G. F. This E. B. became an eminent man among the Quakers (so-called).

G. F. had at Under-Barrow, with the consent of the inhabitants, a great meeting in the chapel, and many were convinced. From thence he went to Lancashire, and came to Ulverstone, and so to Swarthmore, to the house of Thomas Fell, a judge in Wales, where many priests frequently came. The judge was at that time abroad employed in the exercise of his office, and his wife Margaret was also gone abroad that day. Before it was night M. F. returned home. G. F. had much reasoning there, and declared the Truth to her and her family.

The following day being appointed for a humilation, M. went with her children to the steeple-house at Ulverstone, having asked G. F. to go with her. But he replying that he must do as he was ordered by the Lord, left her, and walked into the fields, and there he felt a strong motion to go also to the steeple-house. He stepped up on a form, and asked leave to speak; the priest consenting, G. F. began thus: "He is not a Jew who is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision which is outward; but he is a Jew that is one inwardly, and that is circumcision, which is of the heart." And so he went on, and said, "that Christ was the light of the world, and enlightened every man that cometh into the world, and that by this light they might be gathered to God," etc. M. F. standing up in her pew wondered at this doctrine, having never heard any such before.

His words did so effectually reach her that she sat down in her pew again, and weeping bitterly, cried in her spirit to the Lord. G. F. still going on, declared against the false prophets, and said, that their way of worship was but talking of other men's words, and that they themselves were out of the life and spirit which those were in who gave them forth. Then cried out a justice of the peace, "Take him away." But M. F. said to the officers, "Let him alone. Why may not he speak as well as any other?" Priest Lampitt, it is like to please her, said also, "Let him speak." G. F., speaking yet awhile, was at length led out by the constable, according to the order of the said Justice Sawyer, and then he spoke to the people in the graveyard.

In the evening he came again into the house of Judge Fell, where he spoke to the servants and others of the family, who most of them became convinced. Among these was William Caton.

M. F. in the meanwhile being come home, was so reached that she scarce knew what to do, her husband being from home; for she clearly perceived what she heard G. F. preach was Truth. The First-day after he went to Aldenham steeple-house, where, when the priest had done, he spoke to the people and admonished them to return to the Lord. At Ramside there was a chapel, in which one Thomas Lawson used to preach. He told his people that G. F. was to come there in the afternoon; by which means very many people were gathered together. When he came, he saw there was no place so convenient to speak to the people as the chapel, and therefore he went into it. The priest Lawson, willing to give a full opportunity to G. F., left all the time to him. And G. F. so powerfully declared the doctrine of Truth, that many received it, and among these the priest himself, who left off his preaching for hire, and in process of time, came to preach the Lord Jesus Christ, and his glorious gospel freely.

At Brerecliff G. F. found some people that told him they could not dispute. But he told them to fear God, etc.

He went to a new built chapel near Gleaston wherein none had yet preached, many were convinced. From thence he returned to Swarthmore again; for Margaret Fell expecting her husband's return home, had desired G. F. to come. Since some of the great ones of the country, being gone to meet her husband, had informed him that a great disaster had befallen the family, that the Quakers were witches, and had turned them from their religion, and that he must send them away, or all the country would be undone. Without all question, this was a very sad message to Judge Fell, for he came home greatly offended; and one may think what a condition his wife was in, being in fear that she should either displease her husband or offend God.

Whilst Judge Fell and his wife were sitting at the dinner table, an extraordinary power seizing on her, made such an operation on her mind, that he was struck with amazement, and knew not what to think of it; but he was quiet and still, and the children also were become so grave and modest that they could not play on their music they were learning. G. F. came soon after Judge Fell, and Margaret asked him if G. F. might come in, and he said "Yes." G. then coming in, began to speak presently, at which the family, J. Naylor and R. Farnsworth entered.

He answered all the objections of Judge Fell, and so thoroughly satisfied him by the Scriptures, that he was convinced in his judgment, and asked if he was that G. F. whom Justice Robinson had spoken so much in commendation of amongst many of the Parliament men? To this G. F. answered him, that he had been with the Justices Robinson and Hotham in Yorkshire; that they had been very civil and loving to him, and that they were convinced in their judgments by the Spirit of God, that the principle he bore testimony to was the Truth; and that they saw beyond the priests of the nation.

Next morning, whilst some were speaking how several in those parts were convinced of the Truth now declared, and that they knew not where to get a meeting place, Judge Fell hearing them, said of his own accord, "You may meet in my hall if you will." So the next First-day there was at his house a meeting, and a large one indeed, being the first meeting of the people called Quakers that was at Swarthmore (1652), and so it continued to be kept there until the year 1690, when a new meeting house was built.

Judge Fell not being willing to appear in that meeting, went that day to the steeple-house, and none with him but his clerk and his groom. Yet in process of time he came to be so well affected to the doctrine of the Quakers, so-called, that though he did not enter publicly into their Society, yet he loved them, and several years before his death did not frequent the steeple house any more.

Underground Mail Carriers.

Few of the thousands who walk daily through the streets of our large cities realize that beneath their feet is rushing a stream of projectiles one after another, at the speed of the Empire State Express, fired, as it were, from an air-gun at the distant railway station and bearing mail matter to the post office. Yet the pneumatic-tube system has to-day reached great perfection in this country. We have improved on foreign systems in the matter of increased size. In The Home Magazine Theodore Waters gives a description of the method by which the new system of transportation is effected. He is supposed to be quoting a New York post office attendant, who speaks thus:

"I suppose you have seen a boy blow putty through a blow pipe—perhaps you have done it yourself. Well, how is it accomplished? Simply in this way: The boy puts a piece of putty in the pipe, and then with his breath he compresses the air behind the wad. In a moment the pressure overcomes the resistance of the putty against the sides of the pipe, and the wad flies out of the other end with increasing force. Now it is precisely the same way with these pneumatic tubes, except that powerful machinery takes the place of the boy. Literally they blow the carriers through the tubes. That big air compressor sucks in the atmosphere in great quantities, compresses it until a pressure of twelve pounds to the square inch is reached, and then discharges it into the pneumatic tube. . . . .

"'Why does the speed increase as the other end is approached? Because air is an elastic body. If it were not elastic, like water for instance, it would travel at a rate uniform with that at which it is pumped. But being elastic, it not only travels at the speed given to it by the compressor, but in a wild endeavor to expand, its speed is quickened as the end of the tube is neared. So a carrier is pushed along, not only by the flow of the compressed air itself, but by its expansion as well. As the expansion becomes greater and greater toward the other end of the tube, so therefore does the speed of the carrier get greater and greater.'

"It has been calculated that if the mouth of a pneumatic tube were pointed upward and a thirty pound carrier allowed to jump out of it at full speed, the carrier would rise over forty feet in the air. If the velocity were fifty feet a second, the energy in a carrier attaining this result would be eleven hundred and sixty-five foot-pounds. The tube would become, in fact, a compressed air-gun. If the projectile came out of the opening horizontally, it would cleave a passage down the centre of the post office, bowling over clerks, mail pouches and letter racks, like a shell shot from a cannon. Probably if it struck anything very solid it would burst and do the business of a shell by scattering its contents over everything. Now, in view of this great force of the carrier at the end of its journey, how is its terrific onrush stopped without damage to the terminal station? This question was put to the attendant who had just spoken. He said:

"'Well, we make it stop itself. In other words, we make the very force of its onrush produce a condition which gradually stops it, just as Maxim uses the recoil of his gun for the purpose of recocking it. You will notice that the end of this tube is closed by what we call a sluice-gate. The air rushing through the tube escapes through this small branch pipe, located here about four feet from the end of the tube. Now when a carrier comes in through the tube it passes this branch pipe, and compresses the air which lies between itself and the sluice-gate. In fact, an air cushion is formed which becomes compressed more and more as the carrier impinges upon it, and which would finally stop the carrier altogether if at the critical moment, when the force is almost gone, the sluice-gate did not open automatically and allow the carrier to tumble out slowly, impelled, as you might say, by the very last legs of its velocity.'"

The practical results of the system are presented in the following paragraph:

"Some idea of the saving the tubes afford New York can be had by reckoning the amount of mail matter which passes in carriers over the Brooklyn Bridge. The estimate is one hundred and twenty-six thousand three hundred and fifty letters and twenty thousand two hundred and fifty papers a day. Compared with the old system of wagon delivery, the gain is probably one hour for each letter and paper, in other words, one hundred and forty-six thousand six hundred hours are gained simultaneously to the merchants and private persons whose mail matter goes through this tube. The gain for the other tubes is proportionately as great as far as can be directly calculated, but when the post office officials tell you repeatedly that the letters going by tube to the Grand Central Station catch trains which leave an hour ahead of those caught during the old wagon system — trains which go far to the North, the South and the West; when they tell you that the connections made somtimes result in a twenty-four hours' saving; when they say that Western mail now catches steamships for Europe which formerly would have been delayed until the 'next steamer;' when they tell you of these facts, which have become every-day matters with them, you can readily see that there is really no way of calculating the gigantic saving of time which the pneumatic tubes of New York alone have made for the people of the United States, and, in fact, of the world."

At present, of course, the system is in its infancy. There seems to be no reason, however, why it should not ultimately be extended until distant cities are connected by pneumatic tubes. Says T. Waters, in closing:

"Should the pneumatic tube be perfected so that distant cities could be connected, we would have a condition of intercourse which would fall little short of that promised for the flying machine. Such a condition is of the future if at all. It is well to keep within bounds in matters of this kind. We are always on the edge of the future, but while we take for granted that of it which comes to us, we may guess but never really know what our next experien will be."

[Having heard that the mail matter one d in Philadelphia had become lodged somewhe underground in its passage between the ma post office and the Bourse, the Editor called one of the officers to learn how they kne where to dig down for the point of obstructio He replied that at the opening of the Bour end of the tube they discharged a pistol, a took accurate note of the number of secon which elapsed before its echo came back throu the tube. By the number of feet (1,090) p second which sound travels, they readily c culated the distance of the obstruction whi sent back the echo. This located the stoppa in a curve at Seventh Street, where on diggi down they found the carriage and its load.]

A True Witness.

Dr. Ezra Abbott, Harvard College, one of t ablest of textual critics, in speaking of the v rious readings so-called, dismisses ninetee twentieths of them from consideration alt gether as obviously of no importance, sa nineteen-twentieths of the remainder only r late to matters of spelling, grammatical co struction, the order of words, etc., without a fecting the sense, and that even what is l does not involve any Christian doctrine or du whatsoever. No better evidence of the tru of this need be required than the followin The King James version was prepared nea three hundred years ago, and since that ti great progress has been made in the kno edge of the Hebrew and Greek tongues, as w as the geography and archæology of the Bib and a large number of MSS. have been disc ered, notably the three oldest of the New T tament extant, and yet the Revised Version our day does not change a single import fact or doctrine in the whole Bible, but only some cases, the number of proof-texts by wh it may be sustained. What a demonstrat this presents, not only of a Divine original, b a Divine oversight over the translations of t original in all the years.—Dr. J. M. Gray, Christian and Missionary Alliance.

Bascom and the Panther.

One can be led by the Spirit and at the sa time exercise the strongest good sense, soundest judgment. "The meek will He gu in judgment." The Psalmist prays: "Teach good judgment and knowledge: for I have lieved thy commandments."

Then in the little affairs of every-day life are to expect that God will lead us, thro the ordinary sense He gives us.

But there are times when we cannot k through the ordinary channels what God w have us to do. Then He reveals his will special impressions made upon the mind. S cases are common in the lives of all G saints.

In the life of the late Henry B. Bascom, of the most eloquent preachers of the cent it is related that when he was a young pre er, traveling a circuit in Kentucky, he w on one occasion into the woods to study. sat down on a beautiful mossy knoll and t to read. But he felt a strong impressio get up and go to some other place. He c see no reason why he should change his p tion. But the impression grew so strong jumped up and sprang away as rapidly as could. As he did so he heard the sharp g of a rifle behind him. Turning around, he falling from the top of the tree under ch he had been sitting, a large panther ch his host had shot. By changing his ition he had saved his life.

Many times are God's saints led to do things to omit doing things for which they can e no good reason. Afterwards they see why y were so led. But we must "try the spirits ether they are of God" (1 John iv: 1). Any gression contrary to the plain written word God must be resisted. None should be fol- ed that are inconsistent with the general or and spirit of the gospel.—B. T. Roberts.

he Dukhobors have no creed, and only say themselves that they are of the faith of is. They believe that, except through God his Christ, there is no salvation, but faith out works is dead, as also are works with- faith. The fol- g extract from a letter written by one of speaks for itself as to the spirit in which live and endure persecution:

hink that when they have begun to be wor- and their material state to be ruined, they must ry careful not to be tempted. I hold that anxiety for material well-being constitutes already a great stumbling-block and injury to the soul. I ask that you will advise all who know me not to be angry, not to grumble at the Government, because it oppresses them. But let them bear, with God's help, any trial which befalls them. Let them only remember what Christ, and afterwards the apostles, had to suffer, for the Truth. It is important to bear, without complaint, scorn for the Truth, but it is still more important, when suffering for Truth's sake, to bear that patiently.

PETER VERIGIN.

This same man, Peter Verigin, from his place of exile, wrote a letter as follows, to the Empress Alexandra Feodorovna, asking her to intercede in favor of his persecuted brethren, for whom he desires permission to emigrate.

May the Lord God preserve thy soul in this life, as well as in the future age, Sister Alexandra.

I, a servant of the Lord Jesus Christ, am living in the testimony and glad tidings of his truth. I am in exile since the year 1886, from the Spirit-Wrestlers' Community of Trans-Caucasia. The word "Spirit-Wrestler" should be understood thus: that we in the spirit and with our soul profess God (see the Gospel, the meeting of Christ with the Samaritan woman at the well.)

I implore thee, sister in Christ the Lord, Alexandra, pray thy husband Nicholas to spare the Spirit-Wrestlers in the Caucasus from persecution. It is to thee that I address myself, because I think thy heart is more turned towards the Lord God. And there are at this moment more women and children suffering: hundreds of husbands and parents are confined in prisons, and thousands of families are dispersed in the native villages, where the authorities incite the population to behave coarsely with them. This falls specially heavy upon the Christian women!

Lately they have been putting women and children into prisons.

The fault upon our part is, that we, as far as it is possible to us endeavor to become Christians. In regard to some of our actions, our understanding may not be sufficiently enlightened.

Thou art probably acquainted with the teaching of vegetarianism; we are sharers in these humanitarian views. Lately we have ceased to use flesh as food* and to drink wine, and have forsaken much of that which leads to a dissipated life, and darkens the light of the human soul. Refusing to kill animals, we in no case regard it as possible to deprive men of life. If we were to kill an ordinary man or even a robber, it would seem to us that we had decided to kill Christ.

The State demands that our brethren should learn the use of the gun, in order to know well how to kill. The Christians do not agree to this; they are put into prisons, beaten and stoned; the sisters and mothers are coarsely defiled as women, very often with railing exclamations. "Where is your God?" "Why does He not help you?" (Our God is in Heaven and on earth, and fulfils all his will).

This is sad, especially because it is all taking place in a Christian country. Our community in the Caucasus consists of about twenty thousand men. Is it possible that such a small number could injure the organism of the State, if soldiers were not recruited from among them? At the present moment, they are recruited, but uselessly; thirty men are in the Ekaterinograd penal battalion, where the authorities are only tormenting themselves by torturing them. Man we regard as the temple of the living God, and we can in no case prepare ourselves to kill him, though for this we were to be threatened by death.

The most convenient manner of dealing with us would be to establish us in one place where we might live and labor in peace. All State obligations in the form of taxes we would pay, only we cannot be soldiers.

If the Government were to find it impossible to consent to this, then let it give us the right of emigration into one of the foreign countries. We would willingly go to England, or (which is most convenient), to America, where we have a great number of brothers in the Lord Jesus Christ.

From the fulness of my soul I pray the Lord for the welfare of thy family—the servant of Christ,

PETER,

(living in exile in the Government of Tobolsk.)

Whether or not this letter ever reached the eye of the Empress, I believe is not known, but, through the goodness of our Heavenly Father the way was at last made for the release of our peace-loving friends, and in fact they were finally almost thrust out of the land, as were the children of Israel. We may earnestly hope, that now relieved from the bond of oppression, they may not, like the Israelites, forget the Hand that brought about their deliverance, and forsake His law, and come under the yoke of bondage to serve the god of this world, and have their eyes blinded to their souls' highest interests, and thus lose the lustre of that faith and love which now characterizes them so remarkably.

*The Spirit-Wrestlers were vegetarians, at least as far back as the beginning of this century; towards the middle of the century they had relaxed in this respect, as well as in regard to their other principles.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Engineering and Mining Journal has printed the statistics of the mineral and metal production in the United States, showing that the total value of the mineral production of the United States in 1898 was $709,816,750, against $648,804,899 in 1897. The production included $85,082,430 in gold and 58,763,127 ounces of silver. The coal production was 218,106,519 short tons, an increase of 173,000 tons over any previous year. The pig iron production was 11,773,934 tons, the greatest quantity ever made in any country in one year. The copper production was 535,900,232 pounds, also the largest ever mined.

Several Boston business houses have filed protests with the Treasury Department against paying duties on goods brought from Porto Rico and other newly-acquired possessions of the United States.

Yellow fever has broken out in a soldiers' home, at Hampton, Va., 7 deaths having occurred. A wholesale exodus from the adjacent towns has begun.

A negro community in Alabama, containing 400 negroes and but two white persons, is about to be incorporated. The negroes propose to have a strict negro town and negro government. All the officials will be negroes. It will doubtless be the only municipality of the kind in the United States.

The fruit business of Omaha, Neb., is valued at $1,500,000 annually.

State Deputy Secretary of Agriculture Martin says the peach crop this year will be almost an entire failure. The spring and summer have been especially hard on the tender peach trees, and the harvest, even in Delaware Co., will be small. Martin received a letter recently from a peach grower in Snyder County, telling him that he expected to gather about 2,000 bushels this season. The Deputy received word that a violent hail storm had stripped every tree of the ripening fruit. Joseph D. Stiteler, of Geigertown, Berks County, has nearly 3,000 peach trees in bearing, and they should yield at least 2,500 baskets, but he does not expect to market more than 100 baskets. His experience is that of hundreds of others this year.

Reports from all sections of Pennsylvania show that snakes are more plentiful than they have been for many years, and quite a number of persons have been attacked by the serpents.

The party of scientists who went to Alaska a month ago as guests of E. H. Harriman, of New York, are meeting with unqualified success. They made several important discoveries. Among these is an immense bay, extending inland over twenty miles. At the upper end of the bay they have discovered a great glacier, inferior only to Muir Glacier in size. This bay was named Unknown Bay. Four other new glaciers, which have never before been seen by white men, were found at the head of Disenchantment Bay. In Icy Bay, opposite Carroll's Glacier, an immense glacier, three-quarters of a mile in width, was discovered, and named Harriman's Glacier. In the bay where the Grand Pacific Glacier is situated observations were taken which show that its ice will had receded three miles since Muir and Reed visited the locality and established their survey, twenty years ago. These details were brought by local members of the party, who left the steamer Elder at Kodiak.

A despatch from Cinnabar, Mont., dated Seventh Month 20th, says: "The old fountain geyser in the Yellowstone National Park has broken out in another portion of the crater, and during the past twenty-four hours played twice. The eruption, which was enormous, threw out rocks and pieces of wood."

Advices from Honolulu say that the volcanic eruptions on the island of Hawaii continue with great violence. The entire island is covered by a dense cloud of smoke, which exteads hundreds of miles out to sea.

The depth to which the sun's rays go down into water has been found by the help of photography. It has been found that at a depth of 553 feet the darkness was nearly the same as that on a clear but moonless night. Sensitive plates left open at this depth for long time showed no light action.

The first essential for enduring hot spells is to get plenty of sleep. There is eminent medical authority for the statement that heat prostrations are due much more to the exhaustion incident to insufficient sleep on successive hot nights than to the actual intensity of the daily heat.

There were 481 deaths in this city last week, which is 29 less than the previous week and 16 more than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 168 were under one year of age; 227 were males and 254 females: 78 died of cholera infantum; 51 of consumption; 30 of heart diseases; 20 of marasmus; 26 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 23 of pneumonia; 18 of convulsions; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 17 of inflammation of the kidneys; 14 of inanition; 13 of cancer; 12 of nræmia: 10 of Bright's disease; 10 of old age, and 9 from casualties.

No. 2 mixed corn, 36¼ a 36⅝c.
No. 2 white oats, 29 a 29½c.

FOREIGN.—Editor William T. Stead, writing from The Hague, says: "I have seen the American delegates, and they talked freely about the conference, but refused to make a statement about the results before the conference rises. The following, however, may be accepted as a fairly accurate summary of the views they entertain: The conference achieved a great success—much greater than the delegates anticipated—and the result was achieved largely by the amour propre of capable men from all parts of the world, determined to accomplish something worth their assembling together. The result surprised all of them, and the magnitude of the gains is imperfectly understood even by the conference. The establishment of a permanent court of arbitration on the American principle of revision, plus the French declaration of the duty of neutrals, to recommend disputing Powers to resort to the arbitration court rather than to war, represents vast progress in the evolution of human society. The relations between the American and other delegates, notably the English, German and Russian, has been extremely friendly. The Englishmen and Americans acted throughout almost like a joint delegation. This was due to no arrangement or direction, but solely because both nations found common ground of defence, common interests, civilization and humanity. It is the unanimous opinion of all the American delegates that the conference begins a new epoch and that the good seed now sown will bear a rich harvest hereafter." Sir Julian Pauncefote, British Ambassador to the United States, has been elevated to the peerage in recognition of his services as head of the British delegation to The Hague Peace Conference. The conference adjourned finally on Seventh Month 29th.

It has been computed that $350,000,000 per annum is paid to British ship owners for ocean carriage between foreign ports.

It is likely that the Russian expedition to Spitzbergen will have to be postponed a year on account of unusual accumulation of ice around the islands.

Consul Heenan, writing to the State Department from Odessa under date of Sixth Month 2nd, 1899, confirms his report of Fifth Month 20th, in regard to the failure of crops in Southern Russia. Rain has not fallen to any extent, and cattle have been turned into the rye fields, all hope of saving this cereal having been abandoned. The yield of winter wheat will be far below the average; spring wheat will also be less than usual; oats and barley promise light crops. The Consul adds the following particulars: Famine of the crops in Southern Russia is imminent. A line drawn on the map from Kief to the southern part of the province of Samara, and thence, in a northerly direction, following the course of the river Volga to Kazan; thence west to Moscow, and south again to Kief, will give a fair idea of the area within which more or less famine exists. It would almost seem as if European Russia might be dismissed as a factor in successful agriculture. The climatic conditions throughout this area are of so uncertain a character as to be a constant source of anxiety and danger to the farming population. The widespread misery is appalling. Under date of Sixth Month 19th, Consul Heenan adds that reports from Central and Eastern Russia indicate similar conditions as to shortage of crops. The province of Saratov has suffered severely from lack of rain. This province contains 20,879,357 acres and has a population of 2,419,844. It has ten cities with a population of over 10,000, of which Saratov (13,800) is the largest. The average crop of wheat (spring) has been 10,500,000 bushels; of oats, 30,938,000 bushels; of rye, 35,036,000 bushels.

Brigadier-General R. H. Hall, with 1,000 men, has captured Calamba, a trading town on the south shore of Laguna de Bay, Manila. The loss to the United States forces was four killed and twelve wounded. The Filipinos left three dead, and twelve were captured. Fifty Spanish prisoners were liberated. On the 30th ult. the Filipinos attempted to recapture Calamba without success.

A Kansas soldier, by way of illustrating the civilizing influences that are at work in Manila, says that when the city surrendered to the Americans there was not a saloon on the main street of the city, but that five months later he counted 182.

DIED, at his home near Whittier, Linn County, Fifth Month 6th, 1899, in the seventy-second year of age, MACAJAH EMMONS, a member and elder of Spring Monthly Meeting. He was a firm believer in the doct of the Society of Friends, and endeavored to mai them as far as it seemed to be in his power in the cient beauty and purity. His sickness was of abou weeks duration in which he suffered much with oppre of breathing, but was very patient and submissive in ing whatever was offered for his relief. He was a lover of flowers and several were sent to him h friends. At one time when some were shown him He said "Oh the dear hearts, but my mind is now beyond fl I don't know how the disease may terminate with m I quietly hope and patiently wait." He was very tionate towards all and we doubt not his purified sp now at rest with its Maker.

——, at her residence near Marlboro, Stark Co., on the third of the Seventh Month, 1899, HANNAH TINGHAM, widow of the late John Brantingham, in sixty-seventh year of her age, a member and el Upper Springfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. She a short but severe illness with much Christian pat and the sweet quiet that pervaded her chamber gav dence that her day's work was done. On being tol the end seemed near, she replied, "There is noth the way," and we humbly trust through the merc loving kindness of our Heavenly Father she hath gathered into everlasting rest.

n the lively Memorial concerning Narcissa offin, which appeared in No. 1 of our pres- volume occurred the words, "whom to serve fe eternal." We have become so familiar h hearing as a quotation the words, "whom now is life eternal," that the change of a d possibly escaped the attention of the ter of the Memorial as it did of the present miner. But the turn of expression has oc- ioned exercise of mind in a well-concerned end, lest its drift should be towards the view t eternal life is the wages of service or good ks instead of being a gift; and away from Scriptural truth that "the wages of sin is th, but the gift of God is eternal life, through us Christ our Lord;" that the reward is koned "not of debt, but of grace," that n if we have done all the things that are manded we are unprofitable servants, having e merely what was our duty to do—having l no more than we owed.

n consultation with those who stood nearest ympathy with the subject of the Memorial, find them in unity with the view of our cor- ondent as regards eternal life being the es of service for us mortals. But the con- indicates that the expression was written exclusive reference to her present state of ice in life eternal. As it is written in Reve- ons xxii: 3, that in that state "his servants l serve Him." And so for the sake of such ext we repeat the passage: "We doubt her purified spirit was admitted into one of many mansions prepared for the just of all erations, there to join the angelic hosts nd the throne of Him whom to serve is life nal."

The possible application of this last clause to us here below, as if entitled to salvation by works, had not occurred to those immediately interested in the memorial; and our correspondent has done well in reminding the living not to take advantage of the wording.

If one should mean that Divine service is life eternal in the sense of being a manifestation and product of that life, it is what Friends have ever claimed as the law of religious service. It is not service, save as it is in the life.

Several months ago a Friend quoted in our columns the text: "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent" (John xvii: 3), as if the italicised words showed a purpose of life eternal being given us, namely in order that we might know Him, etc. That form of sentence is used perhaps everywhere else to express purpose, and it is instructive to view it so here, as no exception to the ordinary use of language, either the original or ours. But the text is often quoted as if it read: "This is life eternal, to know thee, etc." That the life and knowledge of Him in us are inseparable is a great and undeniable truth; and is contained also in the words, "The life was the light of men." We would not mar it, while finding instruction also in the words as they read.

How persistent the professing church is to dwell in the outer court in seeking the knowledge and the service of the Most High; groping and studying about Him in the natural intellect and working for Him in conjecture and human endeavor. And if we say this is done prayerfully, how often is the praying but an appeal to Him to endorse what we propose. His service and his knowledge in us to be true, must be of his Life. "The things of God no man knoweth but the Spirit of God," and apart from his Son who is the Life, we "can do nothing."

May Friends cherish that gift of eternal life in Him by obedience keeping pace with knowledge, and thus they will demonstrate to others the source of knowledge and the source of service. Such service will educate, discipline, refine and develop the characters and the powers of true servants thus growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and while we may say they are not saved without works of obedience, we must say they are not saved by them. "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy He saved us by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost which He shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour."

Communion with God.

Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?—Job, xi: 7.

To the first question the answer must be in the affirmative. We search for Him as the thirsty traveller searches for a spring in the pathless forest. There is a Divine impulse in the soul which forces us to make the search, and we can have no happiness until the clue which leads to Him has been discovered. We might as well try to live without love as to live without God.

To the second question the answer must be a decided negative. God alone can know God. That is an appalling and overwhelming statement of fact. The mind trembles at its contemplation. Throughout eternity there will be questions which we cannot solve. Our horizon may enlarge indefinitely, but its greatest circumference will not include a perfect knowledge. He will be the mystery of the universe in those far off, those countless ages when the soul has reached its utmost proportions. Or, better still, the soul will never reach its utmost proportions, for its development knows no limit, and though it may gather brighter pebbles on the beach, there will always be the everlasting ocean to be explored.

And behind, within, pervading this universe, controlling its every process of evolution, is its Maker. No sod could nourish a flower, no branch could be laden with blossoms, no human heart could beat, no aspiration wing its upward flight, were it not that this Eternal Spirit is literally present. All life is its Divine manifestation, my own life included.

And this God reveals Himself in proportion to my ability to receive such revelation. I can lock the door, and then He will not enter unbidden. I can open the door—that is, I can make myself receptive—and my soul will be filled with light and joy. What is a prayer but a cry for illumination, a petition that we may be taught what it is best to do, or an expressed desire that we may have additional strength to endure?

Suppose our life were one continuous prayer. It is not within my meaning that we should spend our time on our knees or that we should use any specified form of petition, but suppose we were in that calm, inquiring, receptive mood which renders possible any suggestion from on high, what consequences would follow?

As to all material things we are well developed, but as to spiritual things we are still among the crudities. But we are thinking along higher lines and beginning to walk on a higher level. We have regarded religion as an intruder, to be sought for only when we are afraid that we may be called to another world. But Christ's religion fits us for life here, and we need it, as we need our daily food. It is not the medicine for our sick hours, but the regimen that will preserve us in health until the last and then make us glad to go. Religion is the widest, grandest thing in the world, and if haply we possess it it will open the very heavens that in our daily walk we may see the angels who are helping us with our tasks:

God will reveal himself in a way so progressive that we will seek His presence in the most ordinary duties of life with the feeling that He alone can ennoble them. Added years shall lift us step by step in the upward climb, widening our view, sweetening our nature, until the church-yard becomes the jasper gate, swinging wide open for our welcome into the other home.

GEORGE H. HEPWORTH.

THE QUIET HOUR.—The "Quiet Hour" is a period set apart for meditation and communion with God. It is a season for direct communion with the Divine God. As we read the sacred page the Author, the Holy Spirit, will interpret the great truths contained therein. It is a time when the body and soul should be still before the Lord. We should above all let God talk to us. Too many people talk to God, but fail to be still and let God talk to them. What would we think of a child who would request a gift of its mother and never listen for the answer? Yet many of God's children are just as inconsistent. They never wait to see whether or not He will speak peace to their souls. It is true, we are told to pray without ceasing—that is, be constantly in a state of prayer. But this does not excuse our retiring from the noise and din of the world and placing ourselves in an attitude to talk to God and let him talk to us. Christ to whom all power was given both in heaven and on earth found it necessary to withdraw from His disciples and commune with His Father. On one occasion He continued all night in prayer to God. If our Saviour felt the necessity of observing still seasons of waiting before God, how much more do we need to listen for His still small voice.

Quiet waiting before God is as essential to our spiritual development as sleep to our physical. Without this habitual drinking from the great fountain we become weak and unable to do our best for Christ.

"Enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret.—Cora Cox in N. C. Friend.

For "THE FRIEND."

The words "He that despiseth the day of small things shall fall by little and little," are often repeated as Scripture by ministers. I have failed to find them in our Bible, though possibly, they may occur in the Apocrypha. The biblical language which most nearly resembles them is "Who hath despised the day of small things?" (Zech. iv: 10.) I do not think the words "shall fall by little and little," occur in the Bible. [Additional search seems to confirm the view of our correspondent. But we do find those words in the book of experience. —ED.]

How richly does the Almighty reward for endeavoring to walk in his counsel.

Influence of Mental Activity Upon Morality.

In our estimate of human nature we have been accustomed to make certain distinctions for the sake of clearness, which are often drawn too rigidly. We separate, for example, the intellectual and the moral as if they were wholly independent functions; whereas they merge into one another, and work with and for each other so completely that neither can attain to its full fruition alone.

Certainly, the intellect would fare badly without the conscience. Mental discipline needs constant reinforcement from the sense of duty. Every teacher realizes this, and uses it as a strong motive power. The love of truth and reverence for it, both distinctly moral attributes, are essential to the successful search for it. Whether in history or literature, in science or in art, this is evident. Indeed, in every case intelligence without morality is ephemeral in itself, and valueless to the world. It cannot be pursued far in any direction, without meeting questions strictly connected with duty, and the intellect which evades or ignores them is but poorly equipped for its own individual work.

It is, however, more often the moral nature that is supposed to be able to flourish without the aid of the intellect. We often hear people declare that to wish to do right, and to do it, to the limit of our knowledge are all that is necessary for moral excellence—that knowledge, or thought, or skill, or mental power, however desirable in themselves, are not essential elements to the making of a good man—that ignorance and even mental vacuity are quite compatible with a virtuous character. Some even go so far as to contend that knowledge is a foe to innocence and honest industry, and that the increase of secular education among the masses of the people cannot do anything towards building up their moral character. In support of this theory they adduce all the cases they can find of educated men who have gone astray; of shrewd, intelligent criminals, who only use their mental abilities to carry out base and sinister designs, and of illiterate people who have led honest and peaceable lives, and been good to their families. Never was their a greater fallacy. Exactly the same reasoning would depreciate the value of food and drink, of fresh air and sunlight, because they all combine to strengthen the bad man, and enable him to carry out his evil practices—and because there are some worthy folks who manage to exist upon a very small modicum of these common blessings. Everything good in itself is liable to abuse, but not for that reason shall we cherish it the less.

A very little reflection will show, however, that intelligence furnishes an immense motive power to goodness. The infant is neither good nor bad, for his whole nature is undeveloped. Only as his intellect awakens can he have any sense of right and wrong, and many of the mistakes we make in his training are due to an erroneous idea that the latter has made rapid strides beyond the former. The truth is they progress together, and both move very slowly. If moral character includes the desire and the will to do right, certainly in the intelligence must first appear what is right. Many persons make a broad distinction here. They admit that a special kind of knowledge is requisite—that which deals directly with duty, and which is learned chiefly in connection with religio matters, but they deny that general educatic or any course of mental discipline, or any d covery of truth, not strictly of a religious ethical character, can have any such influen Yet it is through all these, and in the intelle ual processes of judgment, reason and discrir nation, that moral errors [having been reprov by the Spirit of Truth and in obedience the to,] are corrected and all paths of duty beco clear. Who that has intelligently and carefu [as well as conscientiously] studied history, example, can fail to have a juster estimate national character and national welfare th before—to see the cause of a country's decli to note the workings of political parties, to where corruption creeps in and patriotism comes degraded—and thus to discover m clearly the perils of his own nation, and means of averting them? From all such fr insight comes lessons of duty for every citiz and a sense of responsibility, which an un formed conscience would never have suggest This is true to some degree with regard to ev mental exercise. Each one leads by some d ferent path, straight to the region over wh conscience presides and opens another chan for its activity.

It is thus that new duties are continua arising, and that moral progress is made sponsible. Some one or two persons of exc tional intelligence and wisdom see more clea than the rest a prevailing error, an injuri habit, a widespread evil. They seek for cause, and study the remedy, using their fluence, as far as possible, to extend and p mulgate their views. Gradually thought stirred, reason is aroused, judgment is c vinced, public opinion advances, and lo! a n duty is born, or rather an obligation never fore known is revealed. The deeper the thoug the keener the insight, the sounder the ju ment, the wiser the methods, the more vi and permanent will be the moral progress.

In another way also does intelligence gov and control the moral nature, and that is strengthening the will. It is often said t we know a great deal more and better than do. This is doubtless true, and the lack chiefly that of [love of the right combined wi will power to do it. Yet for this also we dependent on the steady and healthful exerc of all our faculties. Power put forth stre ously develops new power, not only in its special line, but all through the nature. one lives up to his own standard; but the hig his intelligence raises the standard, the hig will be his actual attainment. Let him negl his mental powers, cease to think deeply continuously, never exert his reason or ju ment, never seek for more knowledge, or sea for more truth, and his will must decline power, and his moral nature deteriorate. W Sydney Smith said of knowledge, we would of all intellectual activity:

"The fire of our minds must act and f upon the pure spirit of knowledge, or upon foul dregs of polluting passions. Theref when I say, love knowledge with a great lc with a vehement love, with a love coeval w life, what do I say but love innocence, l virtue, love purity of conduct, love that wh will comfort you, adorn you, never quit y which will open to you the kingdom of thou and all the boundless regions of conception asylum against the cruelty, the injustice the pain that may be your lot in the outer rld — that which will make your motives itually great and honorable, and light up an instant a thousand noble disdains at the y thought of meanness and of fraud."—blic Ledger.

"On their return to Stavanger, Peter Bedford felt that his share in the work was accomplished, and that it was not his part to accompany John Yeardley in the service which remained for the latter to do in Norway. After being present at another public meeting in Stavanger, and in a parting interview with the Friends of the town, he went with William Robinson direct to Kiel. John Yeardley had two or three more meetings in the neighborhood of Stavanger, where the desire of the people to attend was more remarkable than ever.

"On the eleventh of Eighth Month he bade farewell to this interesting place, and, accompanied by Endrê Dahl, again crossed the mountains to Christiansand, holding meetings at several places on the sea-coast, where none had ever been held before. His notices of some of these meetings are well worth transcription.

"'14th.—Journeyed about fourteen miles up the fiord, into the mountains, to Aamut in Qvindesdalen. This meeting was the most solemn of any we have had. Many said, in tears, at the conclusion, This is a doctrine that we cannot resist; it goes to our heart, and meets the conviction of our own experience. What shall we do?—our heart burns within us!'"

"'16th.—At Fahrsund we had some difficulty to procure a place for a meeting. It is a brandy-drinking place. No one would hear anything of our business. A rich old lady has a large room which she lets for all kinds of purposes except for anything connected with religion; she gave an abrupt refusal to the application. E. Dahl and I went to the English vice-consul, showed him my certificate, and explained to him the object of my visit to Fahrsund. He kindly accompanied us to the old lady, and told her that we belonged to a respectable religious society in England and were not the persons she supposed, come to preach wild doctrines. She consented to let us occupy the entrance-hall, which was good and spacious. The consul then went with me to call on the sheriff; he said he and his lady would attend the meeting, which they did, with a good many of the respectable inhabitants, but the common people would not come near us. One man to whom a notice was offered, when he saw the word worship, immediately tore it to pieces. The lady to whom the room belonged sat near me all the meeting, and looked serious before the close; and she took leave of us with very different feeling from that in which she first met us. The sheriff came to me after the meeting and offered his hand, saying, 'I thank you for the present occasion—I shall never forget it.'

"Before the meeting at Fædde, John Yeardley had an opportunity of refreshing his mind with the charms of Norwegian nature.

"'My friend E. Dahl and I went out for a quiet walk. It was a lovely morning; the sky cloudless, and the sun shining brightly on the water as it rapidly foamed down the cliffs. After gathering a few cranberries we seated ourselves on a shady rock to meditate. All was silent around—nothing heard but the shepherd-boy playing his horn; the sound coming from the distant mountains into the wooded valley where we sat, first shrill, then softening into a simple irregular note. My friend asked me what I thought the instrument was. It is made, said he, of a goat's horn, and is blown to keep the fox from taking the young lambs, and as a means of communication with other shepherds when widely separated on the mountains; the sound of this horn also keeps the sheep from straying.'"

"The call which John Yeardley had received to visit the German colonies in South Russia, and which had lain for a long time dormant, now revived. A friend who had watched with regret his unsuccessful attempts on former journeys to enter that jealous country, and who augured from the political changes which had taken place that permission might probably now be obtained, brought the subject again under his notice. The admonition was timely and effectual. After carefully pondering the matter — with, we doubt not, as on former occasions, a childlike dependence on his Omniscient Guide for direction,—he came to the conclusion that it was his duty once more to address himself to this undertaking: and when it was accomplished, and he had returned in safety and peace to England, he alluded more than once to the manner in which the concern had been revived, saying he had been, before he was thus aroused, like the prophet asleep.

"He re-opened the prospect of this service before his Monthly Meeting, on the third of the Fifth Month, 1853."

"John Yeardley left London at the end of the Sixth Month, and went to Hull to take the steam-packet direct to Petersburg. In the narrative which follows, we have interwoven with the Diary extracts from his letters to his sisters; and we have been allowed the use of William Rasche's Journal, in relating and describing many circumstances of which John Yeardley himself made no record.

"'Petersburg, Seventh Month 10th.—On the thirtieth of the Sixth Month I left my peaceful home at Stamford Hill for my Russian journey. At our kind friend Isabel Casson's at Hull I met my young companion William Rasche. We were affectionately cared for by dear I. C. and her daughter, and she and several other friends saw us on board the steamer. It is a fine ship, well ventilated, with good sleeping accommodation and provisions: the captain is a kind, religious man.

"'On First-day evening, the captain invited us to the ship's service—an invitation which we gladly embraced. When he had finished, I addressed the company, much to my own comfort: great seriousness prevailed. After I had relieved my mind, the captain closed with a few sweet and feeling words. When the occasion was over, he came to me and expressed his thankfulness that I had been enabled to strengthen his hands by throwing in a word of exhortation. He said that sometimes, when he had felt indisposed and unprepared for his religious duty, he had given himself to a quiet dependence on the Lord, and had been mercifully helped, to the benefit of his own soul, in endeavoring to do his duty to others.'"

"They arrived at Petersburg on the ninth of the Seventh Month, after a safe and agreeable passage of seven days."

"'20th.—Left Petersburg by the train at eleven o'clock yesterday, and arrived at Moscow about nine this morning. The road with but little exception, is flat and uninteresting. The forests are immense, mostly of firs and birch, which being thickly set grow small. Many of the stations are superb. The line of railway did not conduct us near any towns or villages that I could observe, but by some of the poorest scattered huts I ever saw in any country.'

"At Moscow, John Yeardley and his companion called on Pastor Dietrich, a German, residing a little out of the city:—

"'He is,' says J. Y., in one of his letters, 'a worthy pastor of the Old Lutheran Church, a sweet venerable-looking man with long white locks. He was at dinner with his family when we called, but he would not allow us to go away, but took us up to the attic story to his study; primitive indeed, but clean, and to him I have no doubt a room of prayer, as well as of study. He seemed delighted to find our mission was to the colonies. "But what will you do about the language?" said he; "they speak nothing but German." I wish the dear girls could have seen his countenance lighted up with cheerful brightness, when he found we could speak German: "Ah, I need not trouble you any longer with my poor English!" He knows a great many of the pastors, and will give us letters of introduction to the little flocks in the Colonies and the Crimea.'

"As might be expected, it was with a sinking heart that John Yeardley contemplated the formidable journey before him; but, as in other times of extremity, he cast himself wholly upon the Lord, and found his soul to be sustained, and his courage renewed to undergo the hardships that awaited him.

"'Seventh Month 21st.—Rose this morning much cast down in mind at the thought of our long journey, and a want of a knowledge of the Russian language. Poured my complaint in fervency of soul before the Lord, and was a little comforted in believing that He would still care for us and preserve us in this strange and long wilderness travel. It is his own cause in which I am engaged, and I am willing to endure any bodily fatigue if I may only be strengthened to do the works to which my blessed Master has called me. The Divine finger seems pointing to the place where the people I am seeking are to be found.'"

DATE GROWING IN ARIZONA.—If the present advices are correct, another important industry, that of date growing, will shortly be inaugurated in this country. Through the efforts of our agricultural department the date tree of Algiers has been successfully acclimated in Arizona, and the beginning of another profitable industry has thus been made. It is predicted that in a few years American orchards will supply the entire home demand for dates. It would seem that not only Arizona, but New Mexico, the "staked plain" region of Texas, and considerable patches in California and the Indian Territory afford the peculiar conditions of soil and climate necessary for the date. It does not appear to thrive in regions where the humidity is so great as in our gulf states. A single tree yields from one hundred to four hundred pounds of dates per annum.—Bradstreet's.

Serious Facts.

(Written by (Gen'l) Herman Haupt, a Lutheran, and father of Prof. Lewis M. Haupt, late of the University of Pennsylvania.)

Church members profess to believe that the Bible is an inspired revelation of the will of God.

If this be true, then implicit obedience is an imperative duty.

Probably not one in twenty of professing Christians can be found whose lives are consistent with their professions.

God requires perfect love, unquestioning obedience, absolute surrender of the will, entire and willing submission to his dispensations. How many are there who fulfil these requirements?

Christ imposed the command that, in addition to loving God supremely, we should love our neighbors as ourselves. How many do obey this command?

Conformity to the world is forbidden, but conformity to the world is the rule of nearly all professing Christians as well as of non-professors, and non-conformity to the world is the rare exception. Few have sufficient moral courage to refuse to conform to the practices of society even when attention to social functions causes the work of the Master to be neglected.

"Whoso loveth the world is the enemy of God." Can the enemies of God expect to be admitted to heaven and be received into favor? How many church members are there who have not a very strong love for the world, notwithstanding their confirmation vow to renounce the world, the flesh and the devil?

"It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven"—an impossible feat, yet almost everybody desires riches. It would seem therefore to be a necessary inference that the majority of mankind are willing to forfeit heaven for wealth on earth.

COMMUNITY OF GOODS.—Does the Bible require conformity to the practices of primitive Christians, who had all things in common? No; but wealth should be regarded as a trust to be used in the service of the Master to do his work. Those who consider wealth as belonging to themselves, to be used chiefly for their own gratification, commit sin, forfeit the favor of God, and render themselves liable to the penalties of transgressors. A rich man may rightfully appropriate what is necessary for the reasonable support of himself and dependents. All the rest should be used in the service of the Master, one of the best modes being in giving employment to labor at fair wages.

OF DRESS.—Gayety in dress is inconsistent with a Christian profession; it excites envy and emulation in others, encourages unnecessary expenditures and sets a bad example, often tempting others in a spirit of rivalry to cause parents or husbands to contract debts, which destroy happiness and often lead to crime. Doubtless simplicity of attire and humility are most pleasing to the Saviour. Vanity and love of display are not traits that will attract people of intelligence and correct principles anywhere.

OF RESPECT FOR PERSONS.—To respect persons in consequence of their wealth or social or official position is not a proper characteristic of a Christian. Those who respect persons for such reasons commit sin. (See James ii: 9

People are entitled to respect, not for fi clothes or costly establishments, but for int ligence, moral worth, and for effective servi

THEATRES.—Avoid the theatres; the stage not a way-station on the road to heaven. It

IN THE STEPS OF JESUS.—The one great r for all who desire to live consistently with Christian profession is to ask, What would Je do under like conditions? What would He ha me to do? and then follow the leading of c science when it has answered the questions.

ARE MANY SAVED?—Christ said no! O the few are saved; the many are lost. Wh will be the condition of the lost? We kn thing dreadful. The figures used are th unspotted from the world" (James i: 27).

Lancaster G. F. preached in the market, on the next First-day, had a great meet- in the street, amongst the soldiers. In the rnoon at the steeple-house was haled out, stoned along the street. Now great rage e among the priests, and they began, as h as they could to stir up persecution; for aylor (an ancient priest) preached the gos- reely, also John Audland, Francis Howgill, Camm, Edward Burrough, Richard Hubber- n, Miles Halhead and others appeared zeal- preachers among those called Quakers; and n declared the doctrines they professed in ple-houses and markets, whereby the num- of their friends began greatly to increase. t Ulverstone, the justice John Sawrey, con- icting himself said he (G. F), should not k; and incensing the people against him, fell upon G. F., knocked him down, kicked and trampled upon him. At last Sawrey e, took him from the people, and led him of the steeple-house, bidding the con- les to whip him.

hen he was dragged out of the town and n up to the rage of the rude multitude, did so terribly beat him with switches and es, that at length fainting, he fell down the wet common; but recovering again, being strengthened by an immediate power, ood up, and stretching out his arms, said a loud voice, "strike again, here are my s, my head, and my cheeks." Then a mason him such a heavy blow over the back of and with his rule, that it was much bruised his arm so benumbed, that he could not it to him again, so that some of the le cried out, "He has spoiled his hand for." But he being preserved through the of God stood still, and after a while, felt an extraordinary strengthening power, he instantly recovered strength in his and arm.

is made the people fall out among them- s; and some said, if he would give them ey, they would secure him from the rest. he, instead of doing so, showed them their Christianity, and told them they were like Jews and heathens than true Chris- , and that their fruits were an evidence e unprofitable ministry of their priests. rward at Ulverstone, in the market-place, ldier meeting him said, "I am ashamed grieved that you should be so abused." . F. told him, the Lord's power was over . . afterward bade him put up his sword , if he would go along with him, etc.

d now the priests began to prophesy again, within half a year, the Quakers should all ut down and gone. But they reckoned g, for it fared with these people as with , which grow best when most lopped.

F. went with James Naylor to Walney d, having first had a meeting at a little called Cockan, after which a man came m with a pistol, and held it at him, but it d not go off. G. F. then zealously speak- o him, he was so struck, that he trembled fear, and went away.

e next morning G. F. went over in a boat mes Lancaster's, and as soon as he came nd, about forty men with staves, clubs ishing-poles, fell upon him, beating and ning him, and endeavoring to thrust him backward into the sea: but he pressing on, was knocked down and stunned. When he came to himself again, he saw James Lancaster's wife throwing stones at his face, and her husband James was lying over him, to keep the blows and the stones from off him; for the people had persuaded this woman that G. F. had bewitched her husband, and promised her to kill him when he came thither. But the Lord by his invisible power, preserved him wonderfully, so that they could not take away his life. At length he got up, but was soon beat down again into the boat, which J. L. observing, came to him, and set him over the water. . . the wicked crew was fallen upon James Naylor, with a horrible cry, "Kill him; kill him."

G. F. being now come again to Cockan, met with no better entertainment, for the people came on with pitchforks, flails and staves to keep him out of the town, crying "Kill him; knock him on the head." But he was preserved alive; and after having been much abused, they drove him a pretty way out of the town, and left him.

Margaret Fell, the next day hearing what was befallen G. F., sent a horse for him; but he was so sore bruised, that he was not able to bear the shaking of the horse without much pain. When he was come to Swarthmore, the justices Sawrey and Thompson gave forth a warrant against him, but Judge Fell coming home, made it ineffectual, and sent out warrants into the Isle of Walney, to apprehend all those riotous persons: whereupon some of them fled the country.

James Lancaster's wife, who so wickedly behaved herself, repented so of her evil, that she afterwards became one of G. F's friends. The time of the sessions at Lancaster being come, G. F. went thither with Judge Fell. . . there appeared about forty priests against him . . and the witnesses they had provided were a young priest, and two priest's sons. . . The witnesses did not agree, and perceiving that they were set on by the envy of the priests, the justices discharged him; and after Judge Fell had spoken to the justices Sawrey and Thompson, concerning the warrant they had given forth against G. F., showing that this tended to encourage such riots as those in the Isle of Walney, he and Colonel West granted a supersedeas, to stop the execution of the said warrant.

G. F. being thus cleared in open sessions, many people rejoiced, and were that day convinced of the Truth declared by him in the court, and among these, one justice Benson and the Mayor of Lancaster. Also one Thomas Briggs, who had been an opposer of the Quakers, so called, and became afterwards a faithful minister among them, and remained so to the end of his days.

Such abuses as G. F. met with, was the share also of many others of his friends, especially the preachers, who this year (1652), were no less than twenty-five in number; and almost in every place where they came, they met with opposition, and became as it were the prey of the rude multitude. But neither the beating, buffeting, nor stoning of the mad rabble, nor the jails, nor whippings that befell them from the magistrates, were able to stop the progress of the doctrine they preached to the people in markets and streets, and also in steeple-houses. And many of those who had been enraged like wolves, became afterward like lambs; and suffered patiently from others, what formerly they themselves, in a blind zeal, had committed.

Thus the Quakers, by a firm and lasting patience, have surmounted the greatest difficulties, and are at length become a numerous people, many not valuing their own lives, when they met with any opportunity for the service of God.

In Cumberland great threatenings were spread, that if G. F. came there again, they would take away his life. He hearing this went thither; but nobody did him any harm. From thence he went to Cockermouth, near which place he had appointed a meeting; and coming thither, he found James Lancaster speaking under a tree, which was so full of people, that it was in danger of breaking. G. F. now looked about for a place to stand upon, for the people lay spread up and down. When they had settled in the house, he stood up on a seat and preached about three hours, and several hundreds were that day convinced.

At Carlisle on the market-day he went into the market, though he had been threatened that if he came there, he would meet with rude treatment. But he, willing to obey God more than man, showed himself undaunted, going upon the cross, he declared that the day of the Lord was coming upon all deceitful ways and doings, and deceitful merchandise; and that they should put away all cozening and cheating, and keep to yea and nay, and speak the truth to one another. He spoke so powerfully in the steeple-house that the people trembled and shook, etc. But afterwards he was committed to prison as a blasphemer, a heretic and a seducer, and the talk was, he was to be hanged. Whilst he was in the dungeon at Carlisle, there came to see him one James Parnel, a lad of about sixteen years of age; and he was so effectually reached by the speaking of G. F. that he became convinced of the truth of his sayings; and notwithstanding his youth, was by the Lord quickly made a powerful minister of the gospel, showing himself both with his pen and tongue a zealous promoter of religion, although he underwent hard sufferings on that account, as will be mentioned hereafter.

Thomas Briggs was one of the zealous preachers of that time, going through cities, towns and villages, crying "repent," etc At Lynn a great mastiff dog was set upon him, but the dog fawned upon him, and though swords were drawn against him, or axes taken up to hew him down, yet he went on, and spoke so awfully, that even some who did not see his face, were so reached by the power that accompanied him, that they became converts. At Clayzon's, in Wales, many hearing him attentively, the constable stirred up the rude people, and cried, "Kill him, kill him," as if he had been a mad dog, and they threw such great stones upon him, that he admired they did not kill him; but he was preserved by such a mighty power, that, according to his relation, they were to him as a nut or a bean. He was preserved wonderfully, in the greatest dangers. He was in America, died in a good old age, after having labored above thirty years in the service of the gospel.

THE PETREL

BY JOHN D. BURNS.

Far out at sea, and slowly borne
To lands beneath a southern sky,
A vision came of years gone by,
And thoughts that haunt a heart forlorn.

As if my life had been a dream,
And I, with aimless course and blank,
A weak weed, loosened from the bank,
And idly drifting down the stream.

As if there was no loving eye
To guide my feet and watch my ways,
And I, chance-wandering through a maze,
Might unregarded live and die.

Behind me, I could only mark
The hopes and pleasures I had lost;
Before me, like an unknown coast,
The future loomed through vapors dark.

A troubled mood not free from sin.
A murmuring at the will of God,
A voice that cried against the rod
From an unhumbled heart within.

But as I mused, when near the ship
It chanced a lonely sea-bird flew,— Low-hovering o'er the water blue
It curved with frequent downward dip.

Long time I watched its wavering flight—
Hither and thither o'er the sea
It skimmed, as if each movement free
Followed an impulse of delight.

No other living thing did move
In that wide circle's desert bound,—
The bleak sea heaving all around,
The dim dome arching vague above.

And then I thought—"That little bird
Hath its loved haunt, at close of day,
In some green island far away,
Or rock or reef which breakers gird.

"And not unguided doth it roam.—
One eye its every wandering knows;
And in its heart an instinct glows
That guides it to its distant home.

"It hath no skill to sow or reap,
Yet for its daily want He cares,
And its convenient food prepares
In the salt furrows of the deep.

"And wherefore doubt, O fearful heart!
As if, through all thy wanderings wide,
He will not be thy faithful guide,
And act a loving father's part?

"Set not thy will with his at strife,— Thy water of the bitterest cup
May be a fountain springing up Hereafter to eternal life."

I heard the mild admonishment,
The echo of that voice of power
Which on the Mount made every flower
And bird a preacher of Content.

And straightway the remembrance bred
Within me hope and holy trust,—
My spirit rose out of the dust,
And worshipped, and was comforted.

DO FISHES SLEEP?—Dr. Theodor Beer claims to have decided in the affirmative, by his observations at the biological station in Naples, the much disputed question whether fishes sleep or not. It has long been known that fishes lose their activity at the appearance of darkness and remain for hours floating in the same spot, even their usually restless eyes being motionless. Most fishes sleep in this way, just as horses sleep standing. If the equilibrium of the body is disturbed by clipping the fins, which soon grow out again, the fish sleep floating in a vertical position. Few fishes seek the bottom to sleep, but many float on their sides and can be caught with the hand, a fact well known to sailors. The eyes of most fishes are open necessarily during sleep, owing to the absence of eyelids.—Detroit News-Tribune.

A Courteous Manner.

There are two opposite extremes into which persons sometimes fall in regard to courteous manners. Some accord to them the homage which is due only to nobility of character. They make them the test by which to judge of those they meet and to decide whether to admit them to their companionship. They can not discern any value in a rough diamond, nor do they detect that a fine polish sometimes covers a worthless stone.

On the other hand, there are those who, to a greater or less extent, despise courteous manners and polite behavior. They profess to honor only real character and a kindly spirit, but care nothing for their outward expression. Indeed, they are very apt to suspect that gentle ways and a genial bearing may conceal very opposite thoughts and feelings, and thus they frequently imagine them to be associated with an insincerity which deprives them of all value. In their own case, therefore, they cannot bring themselves to nourish what they disdain; consequently, while pluming themselves on candor and singleness of purpose they acquire a habit of ungracious behavior and bluntness of speech.

The man who really has a kind heart and a generous nature, but who scorns to express them in his outward life, will not find that they flourish in the shade. Every time he denies them utterance they receive a set back from which they do not easily recover. If he is rude and disrespectful in his manner, his heart necessarily grows somewhat harder; if he wound another by slighting words or cruel jest, he cannot help becoming less sympathetic; if he be cold and silent in his manner or morose and churlish in his conduct his feelings cannot retain a tender and chivalrous character. And this forms one of the strongest reasons for cultivating a courteous bearing, and for performing many little acts of amenity, which are so pleasing to witness. Not only do they add greatly to the sum of human happiness, but they also react upon the giver to repress selfishness and to increase his power of sympathy. No one can ever nourish within himself a generous spirit who refuses to perform the small offices of generosity that lie continually in his path. Nor can any one persist in fulfilling them without experiencing a gradual response in his own spirit of good will and friendliness.

It is in this way that a courteous manner comes to be a spontaneous expression of what is within, and only thus does it attain its highest character and its finest bloom. And here, too, lies the source of the power which manners exert over us all and which no observant man can deny.

Like all other habits those of kindness and courtesy are most easily implanted in youth. It is truly said that there never was so much done for children as at the present time. Yet it may be questioned if in this very abundance they do not lack the opportunity of cultivating true generosity. With all the freedom and pleasure and instruction which we rightly procure for them we shall fail as parents and educators if we do not train them in habits of kin ness, in a willingness to make sacrifices, in respectful demeanor and a courteous bearin It cannot, we fear, be affirmed that our you people as a whole excel in these things, y they are now laying the foundation of the lives and forming habits which will never entirely overcome. It is unreasonable to e pect that a child who is only accustomed receive, and never to give, should grow up be a generous man, or that one who is suffer to be continually rude and rough in his meanor should suddenly acquire winning a ingratiating manners when arriving at ma hood. Whether we wish it or not the seed sow in early years will surely develop into own peculiar blossoms and fruitage in matu life, and to hope for something different is li expecting to gather figs from thistles. With our gifts to them, let us not forget to best one of the most valuable of all possessio that of a noble and generous nature, expressi itself spontaneously in every cordial, gracio and kindly way.—Ledger.

The Meaning and Usefulness of "Sects."

The word "sect" has generally been us in religious discussions in an opprobrious sen A certain religious newspaper, for instan recently asked, apropos of Dr. Brigg's ordi tion, "Is the Episcopal church in this count a sect or not?" The New York Observer, ho ever, while admitting that hostile divisions the church are unfortunate, thinks that se are under present conditions necessary, a should not be condemned. It says:

THE POWER OF FORGIVENESS.—The power of forgiveness even for an offence against human law is well illustrated in the following incident:

A soldier was about to be brought before his commanding officer for some offence. He was an old offender, and had often been punished. "Here he is again," said the officer, on his name being mentioned, "flogging, disgrace, solitary confinement, everything has been tried on him." Whereupon the sergeant stepped forward, and, apologizing for the liberty, said: "There is one thing that has never been done with him yet, sir."

"What is that?" said the officer.

"Well, sir," said the sergeant, "he has never been forgiven."

"Forgiven!" exclaimed the colonel, surprised at the suggestion. He reflected a few minutes, ordered the culprit to be brought in, and asked him what he had to say to the charge.

"Nothing, sir," was the reply, "only I am sorry for what I have done."

Turning a kind and pitiful look on the man, who expected nothing else than that his punishment would be increased with the repetition of the offence, the colonel addressed him, saying, "Well, we have tried everything with you, and now we have resolved to—forgive you."

The soldier was struck dumb with amazement; the tears started in his eyes, and he wept like a child. He was humbled to the dust, and, thanking his officer, he retired—to be the old refractory, incorrigible man? No! from that day forward he was a new man. He who told the story had him for years under his eye, and a better conducted man never wore the Queen's colors.—The Standard.

EBBS AND FLOWS IN SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCE.—Why is not the course of my spiritual life even and progressive? This question has burdened many a soul, especially during the early years after conversion. At first it seemed as if spiritual progress must be unbroken, constant and peaceful. But soon it became evident that this is not the fact. Days of enthusiasm were succeeded by days of comparative indifference. Intense loyalty, which had endured for a time, was followed by a period of more or less voluntary yielding to temptation, which, so far from having lost its power, sometimes appeared to have increased it. Depression of spirits followed, accompanied by doubts whether conversion had been genuine.

This naturalness of the ebbs which follow the flows of our spiritual tides is not an excuse for them, but it is an explanation. They do not follow each other according to a law of nature, like the tides of the ocean, but they are sure to come, although in the case of the true Christian, the ebbs grow less and less and the flows increase more and more in number and power until some mature Christians seem to others, even if seldom to themselves, to have attained to that unbroken harmony and beauty of Christian progress which most of us expect from the time of our change of heart.—The Congregationalist.

For "THE FRIEND."

A Word for the Doukhobors.

[TAKEN FROM THE MANITOBA PRESS, CANADA.]

From a reply of the Minister of the Interior, in reference to the Doukhobors:—

"In so far as The Doukhobors are concerned, I have only this to say. I am altogether at one with my right honorable friend the prime minister, when he suggests that it is not a reason why we should keep people out of Canada, because they have a conscientious objection to bearing arms. I think the House will not agree with the suggestion that because a man may have conscientious objections to bearing arms, therefore he has not courage; therefore he has not those qualities which go to make up a good citizen. Sir, there is many a man who is ready to fight, and who has no courage at all, he has nothing in the sense of true courage. While I think I would be quite prepared to put on a uniform, if it became necessary, and to go out in the defense of the country, I do not believe that either I myself or my honorable friends would go through what those Doukhobors have gone through for the sake of their convictions. I doubt if there are five men in this house who would show the moral courage, who would show the tenacity, who would show the fortitude, which those people have shown, for the purpose of preserving their faith." . . . . .

"These people have gone out on a tract of land passed over by all other people, not occupied by other people, lying there year after year, travelled over by the English and Canadian settlers, that the honorable gentleman talks about, but who would not look at the land, we could not get them to settle there at all. These men went on a square block, they took up one section after another, regardless of the quality of the land, and they have taken their chances as to whether they would be successful or not. I have not the slightest doubt that if my honorable friend will go up to that settlement ten years from to-day, he will see a population that will be a credit to the Dominion of Canada."

MAKING CHARACTER.—A mother in New Hampshire reared a family of eight boys. They all left the homestead and went to sea. She was heartbroken. The preacher visited her home and she poured into his ears this life sorrow. She could not understand why they had all gone to sea and left her. She could not understand the mysterious work of Providence. Her heart was desolate, the home forsaken. And she said her boys had never seen the ocean until they were grown. She asked the preacher to explain it. He looked around the room, and over the mantel he saw a splendid picture of a great ship under full sail, every white wing instinct with the message of foreign nations. The waves that dashed against the bow spoke of a thousand shores that had been washed as around the world they had swept. The preacher said to her: "Why, madam, this is the explanation. Your boys became sailors because this picture told them of the ocean and led them around the world." The very picture on your walls, every inch of tapestry—these are sacred. They make and unmake character. Guard them well. The foundations of every great man's character is laid in these primal hours of life.—Ex.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES. There are 1000 vessels which cross the Atlantic Ocean regularly every month, some of them twice a month.

The monthly statement of the public debt shows that at close of business Seventh Month 31, 1899, the debt, less cash in the Treasury, amounted to $1,161,587,671, an increase for the month of $5,267,436.

The Navy Department is informed that the Yosemite has sailed from Manila for Guam, where Captain Leary will be installed as Governor of that new American possession, succeeding Lieutenant Kaiser.

Nine-tenths of the islanders at Guam can read and write, and it is reported that they are rapidly learning English.

There are in the United States over fifty distinct secret Orders, with more than 70,000 lodges and 5,000,000 members.

The record for commerce passing through the Soo, American and Canadian ship canals, was broken during Seventh Month, when 4,024,789 tons of freight were carried through. This exceeded the tonnage of the corresponding month last year by 778,000.

A Houston, Texas, despatch says that the Gulf, Beaumont and Great Northern Railroad, which traverses a vast oil field in Eastern Texas, which heretofore has been inaccessible for lack of railroad facilities, is to be constructed at once.

Secretary Coburn, of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, has issued a bulletin based upon reliable reports from correspondents throughout the State, in which he states the present condition of the Kansas corn crop to be 99.03, with prospects for the greatest yield ever known in the history of the State. The acreage of corn is 8,234,560, and the estimated yield per acre 44 bushels, which would give the astonishing total of 362,000,000 bushels, or three times the yield of last year, and almost a hundred million bushels greater than the banner year of 1889.

Railroad men and grain dealers who have been making estimates on the probable corn crop of Nebraska, put the total at about 300,000,000 bushels. This will be the largest crop in the history of the State.

Heavy rain and hail storms in the Mississippi Valley have destroyed half a million acres of growing crops.

A despatch dated Eighth Month 4th, from River Junction, Fla., says: The most disastrous tornado that ever visited this section of Florida completely annihilated Carrabelle, McIntyre and Lanark Inn, south of here, Tuesday. At Carrabelle only nine houses remain of a once beautiful and prosperous town. Communications from the Mayor state that 200 families are without homes or shelter, and many are completely destitute. Of McIntyre only two mill boilers mark the site of the town. Lanark Inn, the famous summer resort was blown into the Gulf. The Carrabelle, Tallahasse and Georgia Railroad is washed away for a distance of thirty miles. A passenger train was blown from the track more than 100 yards. Many passengers were injured.

Up to First-day last, there had been forty-two cases and eleven deaths at Hampton, Va., from yellow fever. On Second-day one new case developed.

The number of deaths from lockjaw due to injuries received on last fourth of Seventh Month is stated by the Chicago Tribune to be 143.

A new way of blasting rock is to place a cartridge of water in a shot hole and convert it into steam instantly by electricity to a pressure of about 150 pounds per square inch. This method is especially applicable to coal mines.

A loaded trolley car, running between Shelton and Bridgeport, Connecticut, was derailed on a trestle at Oronogue, six miles north of Bridgeport on the afternoon of the 6th inst., and fell 40 feet into a pond. Twenty-nine persons are known to have been killed, and twelve were injured. Of the forty-three persons in the car only two escaped unharmed. The trestle was without guard rails, and the car is said to have been running at a high rate of speed.

By the collapse of a slip at the Mount Desert ferry, eight miles from Bar Harbor, Maine, on the 6th inst., at least twenty persons were drowned and many were injured. The people were excursionists from Bangor and other points, and in the rush to get on the Bar Harbor boat overcrowded the slip. Over two hundred were thrown into the water.

There were 428 deaths in this city last week, which is 53 less than the previous week and 56 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 128 were under one year of age; 217 were males and 211 females: 52 died of cholera infantum; 45 of consumption; 33 of heart diseases; 22 of marasmus; 20 of apoplexy; 19 of pneumonia; 18 of cancer; 17 of old age, 15 of inanition; 15 of diphtheria; 15 from casualties; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 10 of nephritis, and 10 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—Land in England is 800 times as valuable now as it was 200 years ago.

In the first half of 1898 Japan sent $10,500,000 gold to England. Thus far in 1899 it has sent only $4,850.

Cancer ranks fifth among diseases as a cause of death. Of 50,509 deaths in Paris in 1896, 2,828 were caused by cancer. It has become more frequent of late years. The average has increased constantly and rapidly, for in fifty years the proportion has risen from 1 in 129 to 1 27, a figure sensibly equal, it may be seen, to that of Paris.

At Wardbury, Norway, the longest day lasts from Fifth Month to Seventh Month 22nd without interruption.

The hostile Indian tribes in Mexico are gathering strength, and about 5,000 warriors are on the war path. Many persons, including Americans, have been killed, and the reign of terror prevailing may end in a massacre of whites in the Yaqui River country.

South African advices indicate that the dispute between the Transvaal Government and Great Britain will be settled by arbitration.

Vice President Figuero, of the Dominican Republic, has taken charge of the Government as President and formed a Cabinet.

The Washington Navy Department has made public the report recently received from Commander C. C. Todd of the Wilmington, relating to the cruise of that vessel up the Amazon. The Wilmington proceeded 2,300 miles up the river, investigated the topography and natural resources of the country; made a collection of animals for the Zoological Park in Washington, and secured a series of photographs of the towns along the river, the natives and the most important features and scenery. Commander Todd's report is very lengthly, and includes reports from his subordinate officers, who were entrusted with special investigations. The valley of the Amazon, according to Commander Todd, is an immense area of low lying land, interspersed with innumerable waterways which, during the rainy season, from Fifth Month to Twelfth Month, overflow almost all of the intervening country. The towns, of which there are few of large population, are built on the higher bluffs along the river, and at certain points, where the country is above the average high water level, there are small plantations where cocoa, grain and vegetables are grown for local consumption. Nearly all of the native houses as far west as the Peruvian line are built upon piles to raise them above the flood level. The valley, strange as it may seem, does not produce food stuffs sufficient for the support of the people. The foreign residents of all the large towns rely largely on canned goods and other imported foods for subsistence. The climate was found to be oppressive and humid. The annual range of the thermometer is from 72 to 92 degrees, and the whole valley is the seat of tropic malaria, which is exceedingly dangerous to unacclimated visitors. Great care was taken of the health of the men on shipboard.

President Roca, of Argentina, has sailed with his Cabinet from Buenos Ayres for Brazil, for the purpose, as reported, of inviting the Presidents of Brazil, Uruguay and Chili to a conference on the questions of reducing armaments and an alliance of the four Republics.

An armed insurrection has broken out at La Vega, San Domingo, in favor of Jiminez, who aspires to succeed the late President Heureaux in the Presidency of the Dominican Republic. The insurgents are said to be well organized and officered and the revolutionists are gaining strength. Jiminez, who is at Havana, says he ordered the assassination of Heureaux, and declares he will lead the revolt against the Government. Two of the assassins of the late President have been shot.

The Nineteenth Century Review says: "The weak point in the armor of Canada is the slow rate at which the population increases. The census of 1891 showed that the previous ten years had added only half a million to the numbers of the people. It is significant of the advantages which its geographical position gives to the American Republic in its commercial intercourse with Canada that year, in spite of the preferential tariff in favor of Engl no less than 72½ per cent. of the imports of the Domi came from the United States. Of the rest, 17.10 per c came from Great Britain and some 10 per cent. from c countries. On the other hand, the Dingley tariff ha killed Canadian exports to the States that, in spite of thousands of miles of frontier along which internati commerce means only transport from one homestea another, the United States took only 28 per cent. of exported produce of Canada, as compared with 66 cent. sent across the Atlantic to Great Britain and 6 cent. to the rest of the world. In fact, while 75,000, Americans spent only $35,460,000 in buying Cana goods, the 6,000,000 Canadians expended $86,587,00 buying goods from the United States."

Thirty years ago the sardines and young herrin Canadian waters were sold mostly as fertilizers. In 1 nearly a million boxes of sardines in oil were put on market. The price paid to fishermen varies extraordin according to catch, season and year, being sometime low as $6 per hogshead and sometimes as high as $10 e have lately been apprehensive of an im- s which seems to have been given to the t of infidelity and agnosticism in our land, he mode in which the life and death of the Robert G. Ingersoll has been set forth in public press, to the general effect of exalt- him as a hero because of unbelief. His was due to his brilliant natural talents, s admirable gift of expression in language, to the daring, which many looked upon as age, in using these rare gifts for the break- own of confidence in the sacred Scriptures except in some of its ethical precepts, of stianity itself. In saying this we are not ared to impeach the honesty of his unbe- or of his intentions, nor to be his judge. eave him in the hands of Him who will do . But we do deprecate the desolating effect ingenuous young men of a public treat- of his unbelief in such a way as to beguile into placing the virtuous traits of his acter to the credit of infidelity, rather than e Christian religion. The unimpeachable te character, which he, as one of the ex- ons among unbelievers, seemed to manifest s relations to his fellow beings, has been led against the professed Christianity of day, as if saying, "Show me your faith ut your works, and I will show you the ies of his 'infidelity' by his works."

e inconsistencies of the professing church ts general divorce from that inward spirit- which makes for pure righteousness, have d to confirm Ingersoll's position in his own and in the multitude of those who do not the way of the cross to be found true. so an alleged consistent life without Chris- belief is made an argument against the tian faith.

noticing Ingersoll's statement of his re- which was read at his funeral, the first ession left on the mind was that every item in that code of conduct, excellent as far as it went, was clearly traceable to Christ's sermon on the Mount. Not that he consciously copied them therefrom, for the Witness for Truth may have whispered such precepts to his heart immediately—a measure and manifestation thereof being given to every man to profit by—but the resemblance seemed so clear, that one must say that were it not for the Christian religion as set forth in the new Testament that statement of his religion would probably not have been written. The standard of righteousness which he set up, supposing it to be devised as independent of Christ, was really brought into the world by Christ. The spirit of Christianity has for ages, though so stoutly resisted by the world, been steadily leavening the consciences of men, and moulding public opinion. And if a higher standard of truth and good seems from age to age to prevail among the people, it is but the Spirit of Him who "must increase" till righteousness cover the earth. If we say we borrow our improved moral codes from "the spirit of the age," it is really the Spirit of Christ as the one life of good that is in the age and which receptive minds and hearts will imbibe, so far as they love truth. To Christ belongs the honor of whatever of good Ingersoll imbibed, whether the truths embraced had been diffused abroad through the language of the Scriptures, or in the direct witness for Truth. Such good principles as his hand or his heart indited were all the product of the very religion which they were thought to put to shame. It is in evidence for Christianity that the very rules of righteousness which he prepared as his creed, never were gathered into a statement before the outward advent of Jesus upon earth, and in their existing and natural condition of mankind never without Divine revelation could have been so composed. Remove the past history of Christianity from off the face of the earth and where would have been the virtuous ideals of the modern infidel? Where are similar ideals found to flourish now among the more distinctly non-christian nations?

This is not the first age of time in which crucifiers of Christ have "parted his garments among themselves, and upon his vesture cast lots." They still continue pluming themselves with outward virtues of Christ's robe of righteousness, ignoring the Lord while decorating their infidelity with samples of his garment. Agnosticism well needs all the good it can borrow to color it. Many another error could not find currency except under Christian colors. Many things are getting labelled "Christian," as a trade mark to get them patronage.

It is said of a tree the savor of whose sap is highly fragrant, that while the chopper is felling it to the ground, it sheds upon him its lovely odor so that he carries about in his garments the perfume of a life which he has undertaken to destroy. So the more exalted and beautiful aspects and savor of virtue under Christian civilization seem to be the heritage of many who would deny or destroy that gospel Source, who could say to them as to Pilate formerly, "Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above."

The article entitled "The Development and Place of the Monthly Meeting," which begins to appear in the present number, was written by an aged correspondent after a religious visit in some other Yearly Meetings. "In my visit," he writes in a letter, "I saw a departure from the Christ-like order of the gospel in rejecting the Monthly Meeting and stepping towards the Episcopal order of church government—from Christ in his spiritual appearance in the hearts of all the brethren to the one man power, prefigured by the Israelites rejecting the Lord in the prophet, and asking for a king like the nations around them. And I see in all the tribes of Friends a want, as it looks to my mind, of a right comprehension of the purposes of Monthly Meetings. It is in the commercial world a time for centralizing capital in large amounts to the injury of the humble small establishments, and this spirit may affect religious matters."

Peculiarities in Speech.

[To the Editor of "The British Friend."]

DEAR FRIEND.

It is difficult, I am aware, to give from abridged notes the exact words used by those who have spoken in such gatherings as that of the Yearly Meeting: but there are two or three verbal changes made in what I said about the Hague Conference, as reported in thy issue for Sixth Month, which I will ask thy leave to correct.

I did not describe the President as "M." de Staal, but as "Baron" de Staal: nor did I say "Mr." Andrew Whyte, in speaking of the United States Envoy: or refer to Fifth-day as "Thursday." Slight as are these differences in the form of expression, they would, in my case, imply the abandonment of a practice of nearly fifty years, which I desire to retain: not, certainly, with any covert idea of hinting it as a rule for others, but because the reason I can give for it will carry weight with every person, whether in or out of the Society of Friends, whose opinion I value.

Brought up in the Society by parents who had become Friends from conviction, I had taken for granted that its teachings were pure Christianity,—that is, in theory,—until at twenty years of age I was brought face to face with the tremendous realities which sooner or later confront every human soul. My take-it-easy Quakerism went to pieces in the storm, and at this critical moment, under the influence of a clergyman of the Church of England, I had very nearly built up in its place a traditional belief in the opposite doctrines of the sacraments and water-baptism, and such system of worship as fits with their observance.

It was, however, made clear to me that before making the important change this would involve, I was bound to do what I had never yet done, and that was to examine for myself, with all the light I could obtain, and with all the earnestness of one newly awakened to a consciousness of the powers of the world to come, the foundations of the doctrines held by the Society of Friends. I read Barclay's arguments especially, and with them the texts both of the New and of the Old Testament which he cites till, after many anxious days and nights the light shone on them steadily and brightly as the sunrise in a cloudless sky, and I was made as sure of the truth of what the world calls Quakerism as I was of my own existence. For some days the power of this conviction was so great as to leave room for no other thought than of the goodness and love of God. When this abated sufficiently to admit another thought, that thought was, "Now that I know and am certain that this is the Truth, shall I be ashamed to profess it openly to everyone with whom I come in contact?" I felt there could be no alternative. I was bound in honor not to evade: it was a case of noblesse oblige; and I believe that no one who reads these lines, if he or she had gone through the same experience, would have come to any other conclusion.

I had no human being to consult with, for I was far from home, among strangers; and it may be that the course I took was not theoretically the wisest. But as I pondered the position, and remembered that the world had come to associate certain peculiarities of speech with the profession of "Quakerism," it appeared to me a simple way of letting it be known that I was not ashamed of being thought a "Quaker," if I adopted these peculiarities. What there might be in them per se I did not stay to enquire; nor have I ability or the wish to work out the rule of three apportionment between the tithe-values of mint, anise and cummin, as against those of the weightier matters of the law. There is no rule and no law in "Quakerism" that I know of, but that of striving after reality; no "principles" but the one eternal principle that we should love the Lord our God with all our heart, and our neighbor as ourselves: which we can only do by abiding in, and being continually guided by, His Spirit. I was content that what is usually called the "plain language" stamped me with the stigma of believing this, and therefore I adopted it. Later on I sometimes found it involved suffering; but even that suffering was of no mean value, for in it the meaning of the words became clear: that "Things which are despised hath God chosen, yea and things which are not to bring to nought things that are."

I am thy Friend,

JOHN BELLOWS.

Sixth Month 24th, 1899.

For "The Friend."

In the year 1880, in the Twelfth Month, I had a dream which left a solemn impression on my mind, being in substance as follows, viz: I seemed to be brought under deep exercise of mind on account of my sins and corruptions, and my mind was turned to the Lord for help and deliverance therefrom, and there seemed to be shown me a great ocean as it were of pure, living water, which was designed for cleansing from every defilement of sin and iniquity, and I was put into it, and my cry was on this wise, "Wash me thoroughly that I may be clean." And a sense of the Father's love seemed to be my feeling whilst under the renovating operation, under which exercise I awoke and the remembrance of my dream was comforting and encouraging and I have remembered afresh the fountain that is set open for "the house of David, and for the inhabitants of Jerusalem," for sin and for uncleanness.

On the sixteenth of Third Month, 1882, I picked up this little blank book, which I see was presented to me two years ago by my dear daughter Lydia, and which I fear has not been applied to a proper use. And now in the seventy-first year of my age, I feel as if it might be right for me to leave on record some things for her and others of my beloved family who may be left here when I have passed away from this transitory state of being. Unworthy as I feel myself to be, I have this day been favored to feel, as I trust, the precious evidence that I am not forsaken. O, that I might be brought more unreservedly to yield to the Divine will concerning me, so as to be made just what the Lord would have me to be.

First-day 19th.—At our little meeting today I was tried with wandering thoughts, feeling stripped of almost any sense of good. O, what poor creatures we are! Not able of ourselves even to think a good thought. How very needful it is for us to abide upon the watch tower, looking to the only available source of help to preserve from the snares of the unwearied enemy.

First-day 26th.—The weather being pleasant, several mothers were at meeting with their little children, for whom, with their parents, my mind was brought under much exercise, and the language of the blessed Saviour of men was brought forcibly to my remembrance, accompanied with an apprehension that I was called upon to express it. "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven," with an exhortation to parents to watch over their own souls and seek to be enabled to be made instrumental in bringing them to Christ, that He might lay his hand upon them and bless them.

Fourth Month 1st.—Last night upon my bed I was favored, unworthy as I am, to feel the comfortable incomes of the Father's love, and to be made sensible that He heareth the feeble petitions of the poor and needy; and the comforting words of our blessed Saviour w afresh brought to my remembrance: "E the very hairs of your head are all numbere with the encouraging language following.

Fourth Month 15th, 1882.—This day I c pleted my seventy-first year, which brou solemn reflections over my mind. I often f that the many mercies and deliverances wh I have experienced through my life, have been sufficiently appreciated and that I h fallen short of filling up the design of the gr Author of my being, concerning me, but nev unmerited mercy, has hitherto been exten and in that I still hope, craving that the wo that are called for at my hands may be ch fully attended to and correspond with the p fession I make before the world. Atten Chesterfield Monthly Meeting to-day, in wh I felt much exercise of mind, but obtained little relief. But at their meeting on First- was favored to feel relieved, which was lowed by feelings of sweet peace.

19th.—Poverty and strippedness are my p tion, with the feeling that it is my needed lotment, in order to keep me sensible of own entire nothingness and entire depende

For "The Friend."

e Development and Place of the Monthly Meeting.

BY ROBERT HATTON.

When we refer to the past ages in the ld's life, two hundred years presents but ery small portion of the events that have spired within the range of reliable history, the principles which underlie the varied ses of time extend from the first. The ent of the Society of Friends presents to consideration principles from which the sent and future may gather instruction. The of the Society was not the birth of new ciples but a revival of such as having ted from the beginning, had been buried long years under a mass of debris from the nct theories of darkened ages.

n the "beginning God created the heavens the earth." In adorable wisdom He set nds to the earth and fashioned the forms s inhabitants from the least to the great- of them. Man, the last and most perfect, if the most complex of these creations, was constituted that Divine Intelligence saw it was "not good that he should dwell e," therefore he was placed by families in earth. From simple families, the advance tribes, societies and nations, was the re- of the creative principle.

ade sensible of the limitation of his power, has sought from the building of Babel to present day, to increase his ability by as- ation, and where the object sought for is , the desire is a legitimate application of principle. The Divine Master called his ples around Him and taught them the ious doctrines of life. It was the revival ese doctrines in the hearts that led to the ration of our early Friends from the vari- professing bodies and their uniting in re- us fellowship, it being with them the work od in the heart, which, as they were obedi- to its manifestations, united them in the ess of a living faith, so that to them there one faith, one baptism and one Lord and our who is come to be the Teacher of his le.

obably these principles had at no time entirely lost; even in the darkest period eir immersion under the clouds of super- n and priestly rule, there were individuals realized the one substantial truth, that is a spirit, and that He can only be wor- ed in spirit and in truth, and while sub- ng to forms of outward show, their hearts touched by the coal from the holy altar. picuous among these may be mentioned remarkable woman, Lady Guion, who saw gh the veil which education had thrown her, that prayer was the communion of oul with its Maker, and who was Divinely tined to live through the most severe per- ion and the sufferings attendant on close sonment for ten years.

is therefore to be borne in mind that ge Fox did not advance any new religion each doctrines different from those which een professed by some of the reformers had preceded him. Doubtless to him they new revelations of old truths proceeding principles which had their origin in the ning. The spiritual characteristic of Di- worship was clearly enunciated by the blessed Master at Jacob's well, and implied the destruction and nonentity of all outward rites, taking away from a self-righteous priesthood their influence, their honors and reducing all to common level. "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." This Master has come to teach his people himself and thus put an end to all sacerdotalism under whatever guise it may assume.

It is in complete accord with these foundation principles that as God is a spiritual power and Christ is the spiritual teacher of his people, all of whom are equally the objects of his tender regard, that Friends were gathered a distinct organization differing from all other professedly Christian societies.

A monthly assembly was set up, in which no man was greater than his brother, save only in the respect which is due to age and experience and true faithfulness to manifested duty evinced in a blameless walking among his fellow-men—a meeting wherein the Divine love has been the binding cord to hold in oneness of action and purpose.

It may not be amiss to pass into review the object and nature of a monthly meeting in the "Society of Friends." First, to look briefly into the origin of the name of Friends. At the time of George Fox there was great convulsion in civil and religious society. The nation, partially released from the tyranny of despotic rulers, was awakening to a sense of the oppression of a system of state religion onerous to the conscience and intelligence of many. In the emancipation from the power of Rome a young and inexperienced queen, Elizabeth, had prevented many changes which the more enlightened persons were anxious to effect both as to doctrines and practice. These remained to be irritating causes to prevent permanent peace. In some places small bodies withdrew from fellowship with all the different professions and in many instances "one of a family or two in a city" withdrew from all the religious associations, seeing in all departure from the teachings of Christ as laid down in the Scriptures of Truth. These were called by different names, as seekers after truth, families of love, many of their minds being opened to see the inconsistency of the high professors of the day. When George Fox came among these he found acceptance in their hearts for the gospel message he brought; especially that, that Christ the Divine life had come to give light in every obedient soul. As their meetings increased many nick names and opprobious terms were applied to them, but they adopted among themselves the name of "Friends," because they were really friends to Christ, and from that saying of his, "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you;" and again, "I have called you friends for all things that I heard of my Father I have made known unto you." To all in this day who claim the name as successors of these Friends, is involved the fearful responsibility of so walking as to keep out of those evils from which they were preserved, lest we present ourselves in the Divine presence with a false profession, the old criterion being still in force, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

The sagacious mind of George Fox early saw the value of Christian fellowship and he was moved of the Lord to travel through various parts of England, and to write to other places to set up meetings for the business of the church that all who made profession of the Truth should conduct themselves consistently with that profession, and the Truth be maintained free from censure. As the evil tree cannot produce good fruit, so the good tree will not have evil fruit.

Christian Outlook for the Twentieth Century.

The Christian outlook for the twentieth century seems to me very bright. Of course, there will be, occasional retrogrades, and, it may be grave catastrophes; for it is in the very nature of life to be subject to crises. Nevertheless, I feel sure that the general trend of the next century will be onward and upward; and this because I feel sure that the Lord of the centuries has not lived and died and risen in vain. Accordingly, I believe that the spirit of Jesus Christ will be the dominant force in the coming century. I believe, for instance, that his Mountain Sermon will become more and more the supreme constitution for mankind; that as the church understands more and more his mission and character and teachings and work, her conceptions of God will be more and more heightened, and her conceptions of man will be more and more broadened; that the instincts of animalism will be lost in the sense of Divine sonship; that agnosticism will melt in the heat of personal Christian experiences; that anarchy against man will flee before loyalty to God; that the kingdom of God will be less in word and more in power; that sectarianism will be swallowed in catholicity; that ecclesiasticism will wane and Christianity will wax; that character rather than opinion will be the test of orthodoxy; that church and state will dissolve partnership; that church and academy will join hands in glad bridal—the church acknowledging the Bible of nature and the academy acknowledging the Bible of Scripture; that the standard of ethics—personal, domestic, social, educational, commercial, national, international, Christian—will grow higher and higher; that heredity will gain Christian momentum; that environment will undergo transfiguration; that the sense of individual responsibility, and also of corporate community, will alike deepen; that society will agree that chastity shall be as binding on man as on woman; that life imprisonment will surplant death penalty; that legislation, whether mandatory or prohibitory, will make way for intelligent and cheerful self-regimen; that office will soar from ambition into service; that wealth and work, instead of quarreling, will co-operate; that culture will become more conscious of accountability to God and to man, that society will tend toward equilibrium of forces and of functions; that egotistic insularity will be merged into altruistic terrestrialism; that the Jew will regain the blessings promised in Abraham; that international differences will be submitted to an international court; that Christendom will disarm; that the whole world will become one neighborhood; that human units will grow into human unity—men into Man; that the Golden Rule will become more and more the law of society; that faith, hope, love, will be acknowledged the human trinity—in brief that the twentieth century will be in very truth a century of Christocracy.—By George Dana Boardman, at the Mohonk Conference.

The Arbitration Plan.

The plan of international arbitration adopted by the Committee on Mediation and Arbitration at The Hague Conference now goes to the respective Governments for ratification, rejection or amendment, and when the consideration of the plan is resumed by the Conference the attitude of the Governments toward the details of the system will be recorded. Presumably the committee have acted, so far as general principles go, in accordance with the instructions and suggestions of the Powers. It may, therefore, be assumed that a system of arbitration not differing essentially from that published, will be put to the test as a preventive of war. That this system, or any other, will prove an absolute preventive of armed collisions between nations is too much to expect in the present stage of human development.

By the terms of the proposed convention arbitration is not obligatory upon the signatory Powers. A compulsory clause would be valueless in practice. It is inconceivable that the nations not concerned in a particular contention would undertake to compel the parties to the contention to submit the dispute to arbitration. This would be "fighting for conciliation." Yet compulsory international arbitration implies authority and force existent somewhere to compel disputants to arbitrate, if one or all of them refuse to arbitrate. If the reports from The Hague be correct something promising has been gained for the world's peace. The institution of a permanent tribunal ready on short notice to compose a quarrel will invite the settlement of many questions which might without the presence of the convenient tribunal carry the countries into war. Much has been written of the hypocrisies and insincerities of the Peace Conference; but we hazard the prediction that the tribunal as proposed will be used, that its decisions will be respected, and that it will lessen the chances of war.

The reported draft of the arbitration convention covers two subjects— mediation and arbitration. The signatory Powers pledge themselves to invite the good offices or mediation of one or more Powers in cases of serious differences before appealing to arms. The Powers are invited to volunteer their good offices for mediation to contending States, "even during the course of hostilities," and such offers of mediation are not to be regarded as unfriendly acts. One of the articles defines mediation as the reconciling of conflicting claims and appeasing the resentment which may have arisen between contending States. Mediation, thus defined, is to have the character of advice or counsel, and shall have no obligatory force. Provision is made for a commission to find the facts in minor disputes not affecting the vital interests or honor of States, but impossible of settlement by ordinary diplomacy. The finding is to serve as the basis for an amicable arrangement.

A permanent court of arbitration is to be established at The Hague, which is to decide all international disputes which the contending nations may agree to submit to the tribunal. The signatory Powers do not obligate themselves to submit to arbitration, but if they accept arbitration they will sign an agreement, "clearly defining the object of the dispute, as well as the scope of the arbitrators," and obligating themselves "to submit in good faith to the arbitration judgment." Powers not participating in The Hague Conference can submit their contentions to the tribunal upon the terms and conditions prescribed. It is made the duty of the signatory Powers to call the attention of contending nations to the existence of the permanent court, and such action is to be accepted as a "tender of good offices." The permanent court is to consist of persons "of recognized competence in questions of international law, enjoying the highest moral consideration." Each of the signatory Powers is expected to appoint not more than four such persons for the service, and from these appointments, or nominations, arbitrators are to be selected as cases arise. The term of the arbitrators' office is six years, and appointments may be renewed.

These are the salient features of a scheme to avert war by the establishment of a tribunal, and fixing a place where international differences can be intelligently, patiently and impartially investigated, if the disputants have such faith in their side of the quarrel as to submit it to the judgment of a court. The first plan for such a tribunal is a compromise. An agreement to submit all the contentions of the signatory Powers to arbitration was impossible. That may come in time.— Public Ledger.

Convictions by Truth and by Panic.—It is not enough that there be sincerity and fervor. A judicious writer has said: "There is no object of worship that has ever been named, which has not had power to excite the fervor of its votaries. The Ancient Egyptians, twenty centuries ago, crowding along the sacred Nile, seven hundred thousand in number, according to Herodotus, to the festival of the cat-headed Bubastis; the modern Hindoos hasting from all parts of India to their holy city, Benares, to worship its sacred bulls, and wash in its sacred river; the followers of Mohammed, going on pilgrimage from all lands to Mecca; the so-called followers of Jesus Christ, of the Greek and Roman rites, rushing down the banks of the Jordan on Easter day, and plunging themselves into its waters—have this in common, that their religious practices are honored with the utmost fervor of their nature. But it is a fervor which is compatible with the profoundest ignorance, and with a moral condition so low and debased that those who have the means of knowing it frequently decline to inform the world what they have seen and heard."

There is need then, especially in these days when the very foundations of faith are being tested, that men should well consider the things they believe and know why they believe them; that those who occupy the place of guides and instructors should carefully weigh the motives which are the mainsprings of action; and that all should "be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh" a "reason of the hope that is in" them, with "meekness and fear."— W. F. Smith in The Christian.

The first principles of religion, as I have found, are the knowledge of our own weakness and almighty sufficiency to supply all defects. Whoever builds on another foundation will be finally disappointed.—Samuel Fothergill.

And now the mother cast into story form at conversation which took place between sus and his disciples. She pictured the scene the plane of the child's experience as graphi- lly as she could. She made much of the fact at some of the disciples were continually lling their Master that they loved Him. Once ain, with only a mother's gentleness, she said, nd do you love me, Janet? Jesus said to s disciples, 'If ye love Me, keep my com- ndments.'" And then, pointing to the book the floor said, "Janet, if you love me, you uld keep my commandments—wouldn't you, ar?"

The Farmer's Boy.

It is not easy to find a person, whether man boy, who is entirely contented with his lot life. Each one sees something unpleasant, comfortable, inconvenient, and distasteful in s experiences of daily toil; and most people nk they would like some other place, some ner lot, some other business, better than eir own.

The farmer's boy longs for the city; the city longs for the farm; the poor man longs wealth, and the rich man longs for quiet l comfort; the mechanic wishes he was a rchant, and the merchant wishes he had er seen the city where his life has been sted and blasted in a mad and fruitless chase er worldly gain. Many a boy who has become contented with his home and his labors there, left for the great city, and has been sucked vn into the whirlpool of sin and darkness and th; and after his life has been wrecked, seen his error when too late to correct or air it. Had he remained with the honest n and horses, and studied the Scriptures; he honored his father and mother, and eaten bread in the sweat of his face, he might e prospered in this world, and inherited life rnal in the world to come.

Of course we do not escape temptations in country. Christ was tempted of the devil he wilderness. There are bad people and bad habits in country as well as in the city. There are country cider barrels which are as full of mischief as the city beer barrels; and there are people who will give a drunkard, struggling with evil habit, cider enough to start him on the straight road to the pit; but there is often more restraint, more strength, and more individuality in country life than in the rushing crowds that gather in cities, where men are only wheels in a great machine, and are worked, used up, broken, flung away, and replaced by others which are also used, worn out, and cast aside.

The most successful men in the great business centres of the world have been brought up in the country until they have become strong, robust, and vigorous; and then with good constitutions, good health, good principles, and good habits, they have pushed their way to the front and done a work which they could never have done if they had been brought up amid the enervating influences of wealth, luxury, and city life.

Let the farmer's boy drive the oxen, train the colts, till the soil, read the good books, study his lessons, and serve his God, and when the Lord shall call him into other fields he will have health and courage, and as his day so shall his strength be.—Common People.

Be Patient.

In your patience possess ye your souls (Luke xxi: 19).

Patience! A very humble virtue and yet one which has much to do with our happiness and with the sweetness of our friendships. It is a virtue to be carefully cultivated, for without it we are a regret to ourselves and a sorrow to others.

Patience is of two sorts. First, it indicates the ability to preserve your equilibrium under exasperating circumstances. It is, therefore, closely allied to self-control, for without self-control you cannot be patient. It enables you to preserve an unruffled temper in the midst of disturbing provocations and to look with a large degree of charity on the weaknesses or the petulance or the anger of those with whom you have relations.

Then there is another kind of patience. It refers to the manner in which we bear the ills of life, the spirit in which we endure hardship and struggle in any of its ten thousand shapes. When we suffer quietly—that is, with a placid and still trustful soul—patience develops and becomes fortitude. Patience requires a degree of courage; and fortitude, which means that we have a very heavy burden to bear, requires a still larger degree of courage. When patience under the petty ills of life evolves into fortitude under the greater ills the next and last achievement is resignation, which indicates our belief that these great afflictions are in the providence of God, and that we are submissive because He will help us to bear them and will bring out of them the most exalted spiritual condition that human nature can attain.

So I declare that there is little more desirable than patience, a virtue so homely that most of us overlook it, but so necessary that a noble character cannot be built on any other foundation. What would our lives be without it? What else do we require so constantly? No day passes but we need to exercise it toward the events of life and toward our best friends.

To the poor man who thinks his future is hopeless, who feels that the world is against him and who is tempted to bitterness of soul thereby, I simply whisper the single word, Patience! If resistance is useless, then resist not, but let resignation take its place.

To the sorrowing one who wonders if these tears will ever cease, who dreams of a better land where there will be no broken ties, and across whose threshold death never passes, but who gives way to doubt through excess of grief, I cry out, Patience!

Be quiet, therefore, placid of soul, whatever happens. Be so true to thyself that thou wilt never lose control of thyself. Never allow impatience to despoil thee of thy faith in God or thy charity for thy neighbors. Things may go wrong, but the stout heart which believes that this is God's world and that He has not left it to its fate will find some comfort, some happiness in every experience that comes.

The Christ had that calmness of character which indicates not indifference but strength. The mightiest thing on earth is a quiet soul, which puts its trust in God, knows that it has the power to bear all that He may ordain, and so lives from year to year in the serenity of faith. To such a one it is but stepping across an imaginary line to go to heaven.

G. H. HEPWORTH.

Miles Halhead, travelling in Yorkshire, came to Skipton, where, declaring the word of Truth, he was so sorely abused and beaten, that he lay for dead; nevertheless by the Lord's power, he was healed of all his bruises, and within three hours he was healthy and sound again, to the astonishment of those who abused him, and to the convincing of many that beheld him.

At Doncaster, instead of hearkening to what he said, they fell upon him in a great rage, and drove him out of the town, and he being sorely bruised, was left for dead. But he got up again, and went to a friend's house, and the Lord made him sound of all his bruises.

Thence he went to York, and though he met with great hardships, yet he was supported by an invisible hand.

In Lancashire, one Captain Rawlinson took hold of his arms and shoulders, and calling another man to take him by the feet and legs, they threw him over the wall, by which fall he was exceedingly bruised, so that he had much to do to get home. By the way it was inwardly said to him, that he must be content with what was befallen him that day, and that if he was faithful in what the Lord required of him, then he would heal him again.

Within six days he went to Windermere steeple-house, and having spoken the word of the Lord to the priest and people, without receiving any harm, he was healed that day of his sore bruises.

Sometime after he came to Furness in Lancashire, to the house of captain Adam Sands, where he found a great number of professors gathered, and priest Lampett preaching. But as soon as Miles entered, Lampett was silent, which continuing a pretty while, captain Sands said to him, "Sir, what is the matter: are you not well?" to which the priest answered "I am well, but I shall speak no more as long as the dumb devil is in the house," &c. Another priest, whose name was Camelford, being asked by the captain to speak used similar language to excuse himself. Then the captain came to Miles, and taking him by the hand, led him out of the house. In all that time he had not spoken a word, and saw now the accomplishment of what he had been persuaded of before, viz: that an invisible power would confound by him the wisdom of the priests when he spoke never a word.

At Newcastle Miles said to the mayor, rulers, and priests of that town, that God's anger was kindled against them, because they had shut the kingdom of heaven against men, and would not enter themselves, nor suffer them that would. Because of this he was imprisoned: but the mayor being much troubled, sent for the sheriff (for these two had committed Miles) and said to him, "We have not done well in committing an innocent man to prison: pray let us release him." The sheriff consenting, Miles was set at liberty. Then he declared the word of the Lord in those parts, and many were convinced of the truth held forth by him.

About this time Oliver Cromwell had called a parliament. . . . Those who had imprisoned G. F. began to grow afraid, it may be, because the Parliament took notice of these doings, and . . he was released. At that time there was also Robert Widders, who being moved to go to Coldbeck steeple-house, the Baptist teacher went with him. There was one—Hutton preaching to whom he spoke; but the rude people threw him down, and dragged him into the yard, where they pushed and beat him till the blood gushed out of his mouth, so that he lay for dead some time, but a certain woman coming to him, held up his head, so that at length he recovered his breath. The same day William Dewsbury was so violently beaten by the people that he was almost killed, but the Lord's power healed him.

As R. W. was very zealous in speaking to the priests, so he suffered very much in his estate, because for conscience' sake he refused to pay them tithes; and on that account there was taken at sundry times, to the value of £143, beside what he suffered for meetings, &c., which also amounted to a considerable sum. And this (injustice) not only befell him, but it was the portion of many hundreds, perhaps thousands of those of his persuasion.

By this that hath been said, may be seen by what means the Quakers, so called, grew so numerous in those early times. As on one hand there were raised zealous preachers; so on the other hand there were abundance of people in England, who, having searched all sects, could nowhere find satisfaction for their hungry souls. And these now understanding that God by his light was so near in their hearts, began to take heed thereunto, and soon found that this gave them far more victory over the corruption of their minds (under which they had long groaned) than all the self-willed worships which they with some zeal had performed many years. And besides many of a rude life were brought over to be as zealous in doing good, as formerly they had been in working evil.

Perhaps some will think it very indecent that they went so frequently to the steeple-houses, and there spoke to the priests; but whatsoever any may judge concerning this, it is certain that those teachers generally did not bring forth the fruits of godliness, as was well known to those who themselves had been priests, and freely resigned, thenceforth to follow Christ in the way of his cross; and these were none of the least zealous, etc. Yet they were not for using sharp language against such teachers, who, according to their knowledge, feared God, but against those who were only rich in words.

G. F. passing to Huxham, had a great meeting there on the top of a hill. Then travelling on, came into Cumberland, where he had a meeting of many thousands of people on a hill near Langlands. There being now several others, who preached the doctrine of the inward light of God, which convinceth man of sin, the number of those professors of the light increased greatly. A certain priest in Wales, sent two of his congregation into the north of England, to enquire what kind of people the Quakers were. These two became convinced, and embraced the Truth.

One of these John-ap-John, continuing faithful, became a minister of the gospel, but the other afterwards departed from his convincement.

In 1654 A. D. there were above sixty ministers of the Word raised in the service of the gospel, to turn people, (where they could have opportunity), from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God.

Of these Edward Burrough and Francis Howgill, with Anthony Pierson, came to London.

Somewhat before the time they came a few small meetings had been held in London, attended by Ruth Crouch, Anne Downer, (afterwards wife of George Whitehead), and Isabella Buttery, also Amos Stoddart (formerly a military officer) and but few other men.

The Lord blessed Edward Burrough's ministry with very glorious success and was such an excellent instrument in his hand, that some eminent men were touched to the heart by the power of the word of life which he preached. And although coals of fire, as it were, came forth of his mouth, to the consuming of briers and thorns, and he passing through unbeaten paths, trampled upon wild thistles and luxuriant tares; yet his wholesome doctrine dropped as the oil of joy upon the spirits of the mourners in Zion.

Francis Howgill, also an eminent and eloquent man, being at London, went to court, to utter what was in his mind to O. Cromwell, etc.

The number of the said people increasing at London from time to time, several meetings were erected there. They became so numerous that a house known by the name of the Bull and Mouth was hired for a meeting house.

LOVE not the world, neither the things that are in the world (1 John ii: 15). If you will go to the banks of a little stream, and watch the flies that come to bathe in it, you will notice that, while they plunge their bodies into the water, they keep their wings high out of the water; and, after swimming about a little while, they fly away with their wings unwet through the sunny air. Now, that is the lesson for us. Here we are immersed in the cares and business of the world; but let us keep the wings of our soul, our faith and our love, out of the world, that, with these unclogged we may be ready to take our flight to heaven.—J. Inglis.

MEMORIES.

Oh the sweet prairie flowers,
How they bring my childhood hours
Back to memory, as I see them once again,
With their bright cheer nature smiles,
As the prairie-land beguiles
Wandering footsteps to its treasures now and then.

As to-night I gaze once more,
On their beauty, as before
Plucking here and there the choicest and the best,
I think of Him most good,
Who in prairie solitude,
Raised these wonders in their simple beauty dressed.

If the "lilies of the field"
Can such wondrous beauty yield,
At the touches which are given by His power;
How much more the soul of man,
Did it yield but to the plan
Of his soul-expanding influence every hour!

Since my childish footsteps trod,
In the past, the virgin sod
Of my loved, my native prairie state,
Many changes I have seen;
Life has worn a graver mien,
Brought its sorrows and its trials small and great.

Best of parents have been laid—
One beneath the forest shade—
And the other 'neath my native prairie sod.
While their souls in sweet assent,
At the summons, calmly went To the presence of their Father and their God.

Death, with keen unsparing dart,
Took these treasures of my heart,
Left a sad and lonely void its depth within.
But I trust we'll meet again,
In that world beyond my ken;
Meet in triumph over death and over sin.

Though my lone heart seldom feels,
Joys, which but the world reveals;
Though no laurels I may win of earthly fame,
May I hand the cup of cheer
To the heavy laden here,
And some little service render in His name.

Could my life some brightness lend,
Or the cause of Truth defend,
Growing, meanwhile, in Christ's love and perfect grace
'Twould repay for lonely hours,
Clip from off the thorns the flowers,
Sweetest tokens from his happy trysting place.

Results of the International Peace Conferenc

The following appreciative remarks upo the recent Peace Conference at The Hague ar taken from City and State, published in th city:

"The Peace Conference at The Hague ha accomplished larger results than even the mos hopeful of prophets dared predict, or tha would have been achieved if what may be co sidered the principal object of the Czar ha been gained. An agreement among the repr sentatives of the Great Powers to the establis ment of a permanent court of arbitration, t which all nations may resort for the settlemen of war-threatening contentions—that is th recognition of a great principle. It is the ac mission that it is better to let reason and la say who is right in a quarrel, rather than th dynamite, armored cruisers, and skilfully m nœuvered battalions shall determine who weaker and who stronger. For the natio to have agreed simply not to increase the armaments would have been only an expedien to lessen taxation or somewhat minimize th shock of a particular conflict; it would hav established no useful principle. It would hav determined nothing as to the way in which i ternational quarrels should be settled, or as e relative value, in determining such dis-ıtes, of force and law, of reason and brute olence. It is the difference between a makeift expedient and a broad principle having s roots deep in a far-reaching truth. . . .

this particular instance the nations are simply reeing to adopt that higher and better line procedure in their collective contentions ıich long ago reputable individuals adopted settling their contentions. They have said rmally to the world: 'It is better to settle sputes of this kind by the decision of the ost learned, wise, and impartial judges that can find, than to kill thousands of men, ultiply widows and orphans, desolate innuerable homes, burden our people with taxes, d generally augment the sum of human mis-y.' This does not seem an altogether un-asonable conclusion to come to, and it is a her late hour in the world's history to have ached it; moreover, it would seem to cast ne reflections upon the Rooseveltian 'stren-us life;' but it is none the less a very great hievement, and worthy the deepest gratitude which the appreciative mind and sound heart e capable. That we should finally reach this ting-place in the long road of human pro-ess one who knows anything of the history civilization might have foretold with reason-e certainty. Law and reason are advancing the affairs of men with the sureness, if with e slowness, with which the glacier moves.
at which causes this advance is the irrepresle aspirations of the human heart and the nan mind to be a little better and a little er than our fathers. That this particular od thing would come we were justified in dicting, because good things of just the ne kind, closely akin to it, had been steadily ing through the past. It is but reason and ıt claiming their sceptre and throne in a sh domain after a long series of similar con-sts—another instance of a kind of expansion ch lovers of justice rejoice in. It is the y slowness of the process—accompanied, as s, by intermittent reaction—which inspires uiet confidence that victory will come at
. He who has studied the advance of a al idea through centuries, and is familiar ı its behavior, finds that it moves with the ariability of a certain law. He feels that we afford to wait. He is just as certain that law of justice and of love is quietly, perently elbowing out the passion and unreason violence and hate as the student of the h's surface is that the glacial period is ring, though he may at the moment stand n the apparently changeless ice rivers of tzerland or Alaska. They once covered regions of country at present habitable productive, but have now retired to a few ote corners of the earth. . . .

The strength of the war-lovers, the advo-s of 'the strenuous life,' lies in the gulli-y of men; in their disposition to yield to als to a false sentiment of patriotism and onal honor, to a spurious loyalty. With t deadly effect such cries can be used to ead thousands of good men into support justification of war that violates the fundatal principles of free government and hu-ity, how prone men are to abandon princi-under the temptation of self-interest or delusion of pride, we of the United States ainfully and humiliating reminded at this moment. We have enunciated a great truth at The Hague, and at the same moment spoken its antagonistic falsehood in the Philippines. This is the dark and discouraging side of the picture. But even such human weaknesses can not permanently obstruct the progress of great reforms, though they do so again and again temporarily. The history of the extinction of negro slavery in the British West Indies and in our own country, the story of Lord Shaftesbury's long struggle for the relief of children from destructive labor in the mines and factories of Great Britain, illustrate perfectly both the enormous difficulties met with in such efforts and their final and absolute triumph. The work of the Peace Conference at The Hague records another great victory for humanity—one in which both Great Britain and the United States have a most honorable and prominent part; but it is a victory which will demand the constant effort of the intelligent and influential citizens of all the nations sharing in the conclusions of the Conference to render decisive."

We add the following from the British Friend:—

"Has the Peace Conference failed or succeeded? The answer seems to depend on the standard by which it is judged. If anyone seriously thought that it would inaugurate an era of immediate and progressive disarmament, and that without this it would be worthless, it has of course failed. So it has if the test of success is made to consist in a general agreement not to apply inventive genius to engines of destruction. If anyone, again, considers that compulsory resort to arbitration in all cases of international dispute was the only thing worth contending for, then the Conference has failed. It has accomplished none of these things. But it has done much nevertheless. Besides the details to which we referred a month ago, it has done what has for long years been the dream of all peace-advocates, —established a permanent tribunal for the arbitration of international disputes. It is surely absurd to say that this will be of no use because there is to be no compulsion to use it. It would be as reasonable to say that voluntary resort to arbitration has been of no service in industrial quarrels. The setting up of a permanent court will make resort to arbitration easier, and put an added stigma on the nation that refuses to have recourse to it. Though the burden of armaments is not to be lifted yet, we believe that the development of arbitration is the true path of progress, and that a long step towards peace has been taken. The fact that all the clauses constituting a permanent court of arbitration were passed by the Third Commission unanimously, and that France and Germany stood hand in hand in support of the article that lays it as a duty on the Powers to advise Powers in dispute to use the court, (which is a long step towards compulsion) belies nearly all the forecasts of the cynics."

THERE is a wide-spread fear of being counted narrow, but there is a narrowness which leads to life. "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it is accomplished?"

How seldom is prosperity the means of raising the tone of our piety.

Notes from Others.

Under the heading of "A Blot on the Sirdar's Fame" the Christian World describes the almost incredible action of Lord Kitchener's forces, and voices the very general expression of regret expressed by J. Morley when he said that England "sent their soldiers to civilize savages, but they must take care the savages did not barbarize their soldiers. It would be a bad day indeed if they had one conscience for the mother country and another conscience for all the vast territory over which their eye did not extend."

A Converted Agnostic to Commit his Costly Library to the Flames.—On the evening of Eighth Mo. 15, in the middle of the street in front of Memorial United Brethren Church, Toledo, O., the elegantly bound volumes which compose the library of Marshal O. Waggoner, formerly one of the most pronounced agnostics in the world, will be burned. He was recently converted to Christianity, made a public declaration of faith a few weeks ago, and became a member of the United Brethren Church. The library in question is valued at several thousand dollars, and the volumes are the works of some of the brightest authors of the world. Nearly every author of any note who wrote in defence of infidelity and agnosticism found a place for his works in M. O. Waggoner's library.—Public Ledger.

A student of social science finds that, taking ten representative daily newspapers from various sections of the country and tabulating their contents for a week, their average make-up was as follows: Reports of crimes, eight per cent; reports of sensational accidents and horrors, eight per cent.; reports of divorces, domestic troubles, etc., five per cent.; reports of prize fights, betting, racing, etc., nine per cent; political gossip and conjecture, not facts, twelve per cent.; correction of false rumors, etc., three per cent. In other words, nearly half of the daily newspaper is made of material that is morbid and wanting in any sort of permanent value to the sober-going person who wants to get at the kernel of things.

A Book to be Avoided.—In these vacation days many are reading and laughing over the pages of "David Harum: A Story of American Life," by Edward Noyes Wescott. It is a well constructed story of life, laid mainly in central New York. The literary character of the work is of high degree, and the humor is abundant. There will be a tinge of sadness as the reader remembers that the author will write no more for the entertainment of the public. He died with that fell disease consumption ere his volume appeared in book form. Much of it was written while the disease was preying upon his system, and was slowly but certainly bringing him down to the grave. It is difficult to understand how one in such condition could have filled his pages with genuine and exuberant humor. We cannot but express regret that his volume should incidentally commend, or certainly not condemn, the use of tobacco, of wine, beer, and stronger drinks, and that it should rather ridicule one's disapprobation of the theatre. There is also on more than one page some indelicacy of thought and expression, and "curse words" frequently stain the otherwise pure and mirthful page.—Christian Instructor.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A hurricane has lately swept over several of the West Indian Islands, doing great damage to life and property. In some places warnings of its approach from the Weather Bureau enabled the inhabitants to provide for their safety. Reports from Porto Rico, St. Domingo, Guadeloupe, Antigua, the Bahamas, St. Thomas and St. Croix, state that shipping has suffered severely: scores of vessels having been sunk; crops were destroyed in several places, and widespread distress will probably result; and the total number of deaths is said to amount to 3000. In Porto Rico alone it is said 2000 persons have lost their lives. The United States Government has directed that temporary aid shall be rendered from the military stores on the island until supplies forwarded from New York shall have arrived. An appeal has been prepared by Secretary Root to the people of the United States for help, in behalf of the homeless people who are in danger of starving, and the first ship load of supplies left New York on the 14th inst. Stormy weather has also done great damage in South America, particularly in the southern part of Chili.

Aguinaldo has appealed to the Powers for recognition of "Filipino independence," in a document dated the 27th ult. It has been sent to all the foreign Consuls at Manila, with the request that it be forwarded to their respective Governments.

A despatch from Manila, via Hong Kong, says that the gunboat Napidan shelled Pacte, on Laguna de Bay. It is alleged that the town was full of people and that no warning of the bombardment was given. The people seeing the boat approaching fled to the hills in a terrified condition, and many buildings were damaged. One child was killed.

San Mateo, about eleven miles northeast of Manila has lately been occupied by the American troops after a sharp conflict.

The Secretary of war has lately said that there will be 50,000 men in the Philippines ready for active service at the close of the rainy season, about the last of Tenth Month, and more will be sent there if necessary.

It is said that the situation in some parts of the West is without precedent since the close of the Civil War. The activity in all the great lines of industry has drawn the surplus labor away from the farming districts and it cannot be reached. Higher wages than were paid in many years past are offered for farm workers in many places in the West, but the supply keeps far below the demand. In some quarters it is said the absence of a sufficient number of harvesters is resulting in serious injury to the crops.

A despatch from Fargo, N. D., of the 10th inst., says: "Two million bushels of wheat are estimated to have been lost in to-day's hailstorm, which partially destroyed the crop on nearly 250,000 acres of land in the State. The total loss will be $1,000,000.

The general condition of corn is reported improved, and the outlook for an abundant crop in the great corn States of the Central valleys, as well as in the Middle Atlantic States, is most promising.

It is estimated that the cotton crop may reach this year the unprecedented total of 12,000,000 bales.

An American syndicate has lately purchased for $1,660,000 two islets, LaCruza and LaRamon off the coast of Cuba. Immense quantities of iron are believed to be there, and also hidden treasures taken from Panama by buccaneers years ago.

A despatch from Laramie, Wyo., says a large force of scientific people working in the great fossil quarry near that place, have discovered and exhumed a monster fossil dinosaur in a perfect state of preservation, and have obtained nearly the whole of this new species. This animal had a long neck, tail and hind legs and short fore legs, the whole length of the animal being sixty feet, and it stood twenty feet at the hips, the thigh bone, or femur, being six feet long and fifteen inches in diameter. It had a head like a frog.

A despatch from Los Angeles, Cal., says: "Laden with relics of the Cliff Dwellers, George L. Cole has returned from a journey to the ruined cities of Southeastern Colorado and New Mexico. Valuable results were secured by excavations in an ancient communal dwelling, as yet unnamed, which stands on cliffs of the Sante Fe River, fourteen miles from Espanola, N. M. There were not less than 1,600 rooms in the larger building in its prime. It was 240 by 300 feet. Dr. Cole estimates that from 4,800 to 6,000 people lived in the pueblo. The cliff on which the ruin stands rises a thousand feet above the surrounding country.

An estimate of the damage done by the late flood in Texas amounts to $7,414,000.

There were 445 deaths in this city last week, which is 27 more than the previous week and 2 more than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 139 were under one year of age; 226 were males and 219 females: 49 died of cholera infantum; 41 of consumption; 35 of marasmus; 32 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 22 of heart diseases; 20 of cancer; 19 of old age; 14 of apoplexy; 13 of inanition; 11 of inflammation of the brain; 10 from casualties; 9 of typhoid fever, and 6 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100¾ a 101½; 4's, reg., 112¼ a 112¾; coupon, 113 a 114; new 4's, reg., 130 a 131; 5's, 111¾ a 112; 3's 103¼ a 109.

Cotton sold in a small way to spinners, on a basis of 6⅞c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.00 a $2.15; Pennsylvania roller, straight, old, $3.15 a $3.35; do. do., straight, new, $3.10 a $3.30; Western winter, old, straight, $3.20 a $3.40; do., do., new, straight, $3.15 a $3.35; spring, straight, $3.45 a $3.70; city mills, straight, $3.25 a $3.40.

RYE FLOUR.—$3.00 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 71⅞ a 72c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 36¼ a 36¾c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 27½ a 28c.

FOREIGN.—The re-opening of the Dreyfus case in France has been attended with great excitement, especially in military circles. On the 14th instant, Labori, one of the principal lawyers engaged in defending him was assassinated. The fact that Dreyfus is a Jew has enlisted the prejudices of a large class against him, yet the belief that he has been the victim of designing men, who are themselves guilty of the crime of treason with which he is charged gains strength.

Lord George Hamilton, Secretary of State for India has announced in the British House of Commons that a gold standard in India is necessary for the interests of the Empire.

The Queen of England in a recent speech to Parliament thus refers to the International Conference at The Hague: "The conference summoned by the Emperor of Russia to consider measures for promoting the maintenance of peace has completed its sittings. Although the results of its deliberations did not fully correspond with the lofty aims which it was summoned to accomplish, it has met with a considerable measure of success. The institution of a permanent tribunal of arbitration cannot fail to diminish the frequency of war, while the extension of the Geneva convention will mitigate its horrors."

A despatch from St. John's, Newfoundland, of the 9th says: "A deputation of Finlanders is here inspecting the country, with a view to arranging for the immigration of thousands of Finlanders, who are emigrating because of the tyranny of the Russian Government. To-day the deputation started on a tour of inspection of the various sections of the islands which seem adaptable to their needs."

A new naval port has lately been constructed by Russia on the north coast of the Kola peninsula, 175 miles north of the Arctic circle, called Catharine Harbor. It is said to be ice free, and vessels sailing from it can reach the North Sea between Norway and Scotland in seven or eight days. It is proposed to connect Catharine Harbor with Archangel and other prominent points by railroad.

The well-known editor, William T. Stead, thus speaks of the results accomplished by the International Peace Conference at The Hague: "The conference achieved a great success—much greater than the delegates anticipated—and the result was achieved largely by the amour propre of capable men from all parts of the world, determined to accomplish something worth their assembling together. The result surprised all of them, and the magnitude of the gains is imperfectly understood even by the conference. The establishment of a permanent court of arbitration on the American principle of revision, plus the French declaration of the duty of neutrals, to recommend disputing Powers to resort to the arbitration court rather than to war, represents vast progress in the evolution of human society. The recognition of the duty of the present to disputants the desirability of resorting to the arbitration court entails no obligation on the Americans inconsistent with their traditional policy. This is made absolutely clear by the declaration signed by the American delegation, read in full at the conference and entered on the records."

DIED, at his home near Plymouth, Washington County, Ohio, on the eighth of Sixth Month, 1899, THOMAS HOBSON, aged nearly eighty-seven years, a member of Plymouth Particular and Chesterfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. He was firmly attached to the ancient doctrines and testimonies of Friends and was a diligent attender of all the meetings, as long as health permitted. He bore a lingering illness with much patience and resignation; said he had no desire to get well, and when queried with whether his future prospects looked bright, replied that he believed the sting of death was taken away. During the last few months of his life he suffered much, and was frequently heard in vocal supplication, interceding with his Heavenly Father for help and for strength to bear his sufferings to the end, and that He would be with him through the dark valley and shadow of death. He often lamented the condition of those who were living in disobedience, saying, "What will they do at such a time as this." "Vain is the help of man." He was very desirous to be in readiness for the solemn change which he felt was approaching, and was sensible that he had no merit of his own. His trust was entirely in the mercy of God, through Christ Jesus our Lord. His family have the consoling belief, that through adorable mercy, he has been gathered into that rest which is prepared for the people of God.

The following notice is reprinted in the present number as there were several errors in the one which appeared in No. 1 of this volume:

—at the home of Jarvis Harvey, which was also the home of his mother, Minerva Harvey, who was a sister of the deceased, MELISSA JOHNSON, daughter of Barclay and Sarah Johnson, on the twelfth of Sixth Month, 1899, in the seventy-five years; a member of Pleasant Plain Monthly Meeting, Iowa. Her sickness of three months' duration was such that caused the most intense suffering, which was borne in humble Christian patience. She was a diligent reader and lover of ancient Friends' writings, often quoting sentences from them in her last sickness. Her mental faculties remained bright and clear to the end. Her life for the most part was one of deep affliction, but we truly she came up through great tribulation, and we believe through mercy her robes were washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb, and that now she is forever at rest.

"Doth He Thank that Servant?"

Several weeks ago we reprinted for the benefit of young men and others, an article which had attracted wide attention, entitled "A Message to Garcia," showing the need of active men who, as one Rowan did, could readily execute an order without consulting with difficulties, but finding a way through them execute the commission given. The New York Central Corporation had purchased the right to publish the article by the hundred thousand, to distribute among its employees.

This was well in itself. It was especially in the interest of employers that the tract was issued, but its tendency seems good for character everywhere also. A rejoinder has lately been issued by V. Bradley in an open letter addressed to the same corporation. The substance of it is conveyed in the following paragraphs, showing that true service is not all one-sided:

"There are to-day employed by the New York Central—and every other great corporation—men who for the past five, ten, fifteen or twenty years have faithfully carried your message to Garcia, and returned with an answer, too, when it was possible. You have received from these men the most absolute devotion. Yet you have never suitably rewarded them. They usually come from a country home, and are one of its best products, and they will return there when they have broken down in the struggle and are dismissed, superannuated, no longer able to carry your message to Garcia. You can be seen in many of our rural homes, disappointed, sad men, usually with eyesight impaired, daily waiting the summons of that incorruptible One who is believed to reward the deserving.

"Mr. Hubbard asserts that "the typical Rowan is employed in every city, town and village; in every office, shop, store and factory." I reply that he is wrong. It would be utterly impossible to carry on the affairs of the great modern establishments without this and as a rule I also declare he has not received adequate reward.

"The moral sought to be conveyed by this message is that if the New York Central will take good care to suitably reward its Rowans, there will be more of them.

Stimulation and Quickening.

In the exhortation "Be not drunk with wine; but be filled with the Spirit," the apostle has well cautioned the church not to accept any physical exhilaration in the place of the life-giving power of the Holy Spirit; but to try the spirits whether they be of God or whether they minister to carnal or emotional stimulation in the flesh or nervous system.

Much of the latter or nervous excitation, whether consisting in the finer blandishments of the senses, or in those more bewildered sensations which come under the name of intoxication, is sometimes mistaken for inspiration of the Divine spirit, life and power. Of all modes of stimulation or exhilaration in the flesh the well-chosen word "wine" stands as the fit representative. They all belong to the wine-group, as being a mocker of the Spirit. The alcoholic quickening is not an impartation of life, but its exhaustion and ultimate anarchy. A stimulus or spur adds no strength, but startles and irritates into temporary activity such reserved power as may remain in store. In the milder excitement of emotions by artificial means something akin to exaltation of sentiment is felt, and the sensation may be reported as worship or baptism of grace. The wine of the ear, a titillation of the delicate nerves of hearing, is called music, and its blandishments though so very exquisite, are still in the nervous system and thus in themselves carnal—though suggestive of heavenly harmonies. Yet it is a mistake to take images of heavenly things for the heavenly things themselves, and to assume that physiological melody is spiritual praise; or because we ourselves have been charmed in the flesh, that we were in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, speaking from Him "in spiritual songs," or making melody in our hearts as unto the Lord. Works of artistic beauty —architecture, coloring, ornamentation, graven images, paintings, belong to the wine of the eye, and are diversions for "the lust of the eye and the pride of life," in their churchly functions, as against the single eye to the inward witness of the Spirit in Divine worship. To worship Him in the beauty of holiness is a far more inward experience, than the carnal sights wherewith the natural eye can regale itself.

Likewise the indulgence of any of our senses as worship or as stimulating worship, as the odors of natural incense, the perfumes, the outward tastes; or the arousing of the emotional nature in its various departments, or of intellectual tension and exercise, or of admiration of eloquent language as being either worship itself or productive of it, is like seeking the living among the dead.

All these natural gifts and functions of mind, heart or body may be quickened, moved, made expressive, and energized by the one Spirit; but to stimulate any of these from any lower source, is to make human hearts drunk with the wine of an exhilaration, which is the spurious service encouraged by that deceiving spirit who transforms himself into an angel of light. We believe that nowhere in the Scriptures are artificial means or instruments enjoined as producers of praise, prayer, holiness, or any spiritual grace. Their right use is spoken of as the product of these works of the Spirit in man, and otherwise it is without Divine significance or authority.

Of the things above-written touching human emotionalism, this is the sum, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," and lifts us no higher than its source, however fine the rhapsody that may be evoked; "and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," and imparts life, renews our strength, puts forth the godly fruits and graces of Christian character, inspires with power for every good word and work. The one stimulates to exhaust, the other quickens to add might in the inner man; the one intoxicates, the other revives with no reaction of enfeeblement, but rather of increase and upbuilding; the one begins and ends in the flesh, the other has its root and fruit in the Spirit and life eternal.

Do we say that natural appliances and conditions cannot be made use of in spiritual work? They can and at times are, but only in and by the Spirit and his immediate authority. They cannot command the Spirit, but the Spirit can command them in his own times. They are made means of grace only when under the hand of living grace. At other times their excitement or elation may be as wine, but is not the Spirit, or to be confounded with his inspiration.

What we protest against is calling those feelings inspiration which are physiological conditions evoked by outward appliances less or more refined. They proceed not in the silence of all flesh, but rather in its sensations. There are rhetorical and artistic and social modes of kindling them. Even a personal magnetism may get the place and sway of enduement of power. Let us "try the spirits," and see what we really mean by "an uplift." "Be not drunk with wine, but be filled with the Spirit."

As we cannot command the Spirit that we may be filled with it, what is to be done? Simply and obediently to be commanded by the Spirit. The law and rule of his filling is obedience. As said Peter: We are his witnesses of these things and so is also the Holy Spirit, whom God hath given to them that obey Him." A whole-hearted submission to his witness in our hearts and obedience thereto in our lives is the condition of His unspeakable gift.

This obedience involves such hungering and thirsting after his presence and life, that it practically includes the asking for it. "If ye being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him." An asking that does not mean obedience—that covets only the sensation—the Searcher of hearts cannot be expected to honor.

His Spirit is the new wine which Christ promised to drink anew with disciples in his spiritual kingdom now and here to be known. "No more of the fruit of the vine," or of an outward exhilarant according to the flesh, should He drink in his supping with us and ours with Him in his spiritual communion. As often as we partake of His Spirit in obedience, we show forth His death till He come, even the giving of His flesh for the life of the world.

A Friend has sent us an essay by Georgina K. Lewis of England, on keeping up the interest of our young people in our religious Society. With two or three modifications, we reprint most of it, on account of the view which it contains that Friends should not lower their standard to suit the tendency of the day, and that no change of organization or methods will put new life into souls or increase the spiritual tone of the community; but that yielding to the preparing and vitalizing grace of the Holy Spirit will do so. If the article lays too much stress on the expectation that the young will become public ministers, it is not because we have not somewhat guarded it from that appearance. Yet we can all unite in rejoicing in all true gifts and callings which the Head of the Church may dispense in that line.

A FRIEND who became interested in the reading of Henry Van Dyke's work entitled "The Gospel for an Age of Doubt," has extracted portions which appear in our columns; being desirous that many, by varied modes of expressing the same truth as it is in Jesus, might be induced to look to Christ and follow Him. He adds: "It does my heart good to see that others, not of our Society, can point to "Christ within, the hope of glory."

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

The Christ for an Age of Doubt.

The teaching of Christ differs from that of all other masters in its fontal quality. It is comprised in a little space, but it has an infinite fulness. Its utterance is closely bounded, but its significance is inexhaustible. The sacred books of other religions, the commentaries and expositions on the Christian religion, spread before us a vast and intricate expanse, like lakes of truth mixed with error, stretched away into the distance, arm after arm, bay after bay, until we despair of being able even to explore their coasts and trace their windings. When we come back to Christ we find, not an inland sea of doctrine, but a clear fountain of living water, springing up into everlasting life. Calm, pure, unfathomable, it is never clouded, and it never fails. The inspiration of other teachers rises and falls like an intermittent spring. Today it is brimming full; to-morrow it is empty and dry. But the truth that flows from Jesus is constant and unvarying. The Spirit always rests upon Him. The Father is always with Him. Out of the deep serenity of His soul, as from some secret vale of peace high among the eternal hills, the vital spring of truth wells up forever, and forever the crystal stream runs down to refresh and revive the souls of men. The one thing of which He wishes to make men sure is that the same God who sends His sunshine and His rain upon the evil and the good, the same God whose bounty feeds the birds of the air, and clothes the lilies of the field with beauty, hears in secret the prayers of the penitent and believing and rewards them openly. The question of the how and the where of the life after death is not even touched in the teaching of Jesus. It matters little. The one thing that He declares with unfaltering certainty is the reality of that life. The one thing that He presses home upon the minds of men with calm intensity is the danger of losing it through sin and unbelief. The one thing that He tenderly and urgently pleads with them to do, is to make sure of its immortal blessedness through faith and love and obedience to Him. And so, at every point, He passes by the non-essential to touch the essential. He disregards the passing curiosity to satisfy the real anxiety, He neglects the shadows to reveal the substance of the unseen world.

Teaching like this is the only kind of teaching that will always renew itself, always have something more to bestow upon us. It cannot grow obsolete. It cannot be drained of its significance. It is like life. Nay, it is life, and it gives life. Let us understand then, that if our Christianity is to satisfy our whole nature, if it is to have its full and real meaning and power to bring in the kingdom of heaven, it must include this element. We must be as loyal to the teaching of Jesus as we are to His example. . . . . And then we must preach it, simply, sincerely, certainly, as the only doctrine which can lead men out of the intellectual anarchy of doubt into the peaceful realm of truth.

The age demands authority. This is what the age is looking and longing for. It can find no joy in the kingdom of heaven unless it finds there a source of authority for the mind as well as the heart. . . Authority is what the sociologist demands. . . Authority is what the philosopher seeks. . . Authority is what the poet craves. Men are crying, "here," and "lo there." We must find the sour of authority in an inerrant Book, or in an e lightened reason, or in an infallible Church, perhaps in all three; as if there could be thr sources of one authority, or as if a chann could ever be rightly called a source! Let not hesitate to pass through this confusion tongues and of ideas, serene and untrouble with the messages of a more excellent way.

Christ is the Light of all Scripture. Chri is the master of holy reason. Christ is t sole Lord and Life of the true Church. By word we test all doctrines, conclusions a commands. On His word we build all fait This is the source of authority in the kingdo of heaven. Let us neither forget nor hesita to appeal to it always with untrembling c tainty and positive conviction. If Christ d not know and preach the truth, then there no truth that can be known or preached. Unl we are sure of this, we would better go out business entirely. . . It is impossible th a supreme devotion and a real likeness to Chr should have been produced and perpetuated the world without a veritable apprehension that which He knew and taught concerni God and man. . . . . The condition of apprehending, and how mu more of preaching, the truth revealed by Chr is that we abide in Him. The word of Jesus the mind of one who does not do the will Jesus, lies like seed-corn in a mummy's ha It is only by dwelling with Him, and receivi His character, His personality so profound so vitally that it shall be with us as if, in His o words, we had partaken of His flesh and blood, as if His sacred humanity had been terwoven with the very fibres of our heart a pulsed with secret power in all our veins—i thus only that we can be enabled to see teaching as it is, and set it forth with lumino conviction to the souls of men.

Life is now the regnant idea; personality utmost expression. It is in the facts of its secret potencies, its mysterious limitati in germ and seed, its magnificent unfolding the process of development that we must se our comparisons for the Incarnation. And very search that will bring us face to f with the conviction that life in all its manif tations transcends analysis without ceasing be the object of knowledge.

In the living world, the boundaries of im inations are not coterminous with the limits apprehension. We know many facts and fo of life whose modes of becoming we can imagine. It is just as impossible for us conceive how the life of the oak, root trunk and branch and leaf, form and color massive strength, is all folded in the tiny, co less, unshaped seed, as it is to conceive the life of God is embodied in the man Ch Jesus. But the difficulty of conceiving manner of this infolding, this embodiment, d not destroy for us the reality of the life. Self-beggary and self-emptying are but "wo thrown out towards" an unimaginable but unreasonable manifestation of the Divine L as life. The reality to which they point u the Son of God descending to live under the conditions and limitations of energy consciousness which are proper to the Son man: the Word made flesh and dwelling am us, like unto His brethren in all things.

It would be hard to overestimate the significance of this view for the present age, and the portance of setting it forth as a living truth the language of to-day. It is the only view ich gives us any ground of reality for our th in the kinship of man with God. If the n of God, who is the image of the Father, laying aside the outward prerogatives of His ine mode of existence, actually becomes nan, then, and only then, the Divine image which man was created is no mere figure of eech, but a substantial likeness of spiritual ng. There is a true fellowship between our ls and our Father in heaven. Virtue is not ain dream, but a definite striving towards perfection. Revelation is not a deception, a message from Him who knows all to those o know only a part. Prayer is not an empty m, but a real communion.

eak to Him, thou, for He hears, and Spirit with Spirit an meet:
er is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and eet."—Tennyson.

'his view of the spiritual relation of man to l cannot possibly have any foundation in t, deep enough and strong enough to with-nd the sweeping floods of scepticism, unless uilds upon the rock of a veritable Incarna-n. The discoveries of modern science, en-ging enormously our conceptions of the sical universe, have not only put man in a ition to receive a larger and loftier vision he glory of God, but they have made such sion indispensable. And they have empha-d, with overwhelming force, the form in ch that vision must come in order to meet needs and strengthen faith for its immense . If we are not to be utterly belittled and shed by the contemplation of the vast mass natter and the tremendous play of force by ch we are surrounded; if we are still to l that the vital is greater than the mechani-the moral than the material, the spiritual n the physical; if we are to maintain the position of all noble and self-revering ght, that "man is greater than the uni-se," there is nothing that can so profoundly irm and establish us, there is nothing that so surely protect and save us from "the orting influences of our own discoveries," as revelation of the Supreme Being in an unmis-ably vital, moral, spiritual and human form. ich a revelation at once rectifies, purifies elevates our view of God himself. For if Son of God can surrender omnipresence, iscience and omnipotence without destroy-his personal identity, then the central es-e of the Deity is neither infinite wisdom infinite power, but perfect holiness and ect goodness. And so from the very lowest y of humiliation we catch clear sight of very loftiest summit of theology, the se-t and shining truth that God is Love. In ight of this truth we behold also the high-perfection of man and the path which leads . Love is the fulfilling of the law, and supreme pattern of love is the example of st. . . . What strength could we draw His victory over temptation if He was exposed as we are to the assaults of evil? t consolation could we draw from his pa-e if He was not a man of sorrows and ac-uainted with grief? . . The whole value he Atonement, in its reconciling influence the heart of man, in its exhibition of the heart of God, depends upon the actuality of the Incarnation. If the Father truly spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, then the Father also suffered by sympathy, making an invisible sacrifice, an infinite surrender of love for our sakes. Then the Son also suffered, making a visible sacrifice and pouring out His soul unto death to redeem us from the fear of death and the power of sin. And this becomes real to our faith and potent upon our souls, only when we see the human life of God, agonizing in the garden, tortured in the judgment-hall, and expiring upon the cross. Then we can look up to a God who is not impassible, as the speculations of men have falsely represented Him, but passible, and therefore full of infinite capacities of pure sorrow and saving sympathy. Then the dumb and sullen resentment which rises in noble minds at the thought of a universe in which there is so much helpless pain and hopeless grief, created by an immovable Being who had never felt and can never feel either pain or grief—that sense of moral repulsion from the idea of an unsuffering and unsympathetic Creator which is, and always has been, the deepest, darkest spring of doubt, fades away, and we behold a God who became human in order that He might bear, though innocent and undeserving, all our pains and all our griefs.

THE OSTRICH.—The ostrich is not a bird that can be easily brought up in the way that it should go. It has no powers of discrimination. "Because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath He imparted to her understanding," as runs the description of the ostrich in the book of Job. It cannot discriminate between a wire fence and the open camp, between friends and foes, or between what is helpful and what is hurtful to its digestion. It was owing to its want of understanding in this last respect, and to an equal want of discrimination on the part of the British public, that it has been found impossible to keep ostriches alive in the zoological gardens in London. A public accustomed to slip pennies into automatic machines could not refrain from the temptation offered by the omnivorous throat of an ostrich and filled them up with poisonous copper, as if they were so many missionary boxes.

In its African life, however, the chief danger that besets it is not the recklessness of its appetite, but its reckless disregard of its own limbs. It will take fright at a shadow and hurl itself blindly into the nearest fence, from which it will be extricated with a broken leg, or fight savagely with a brother ostrich and break its leg, or fall into a hole or gully and break its leg, or dance, waltzing with the most swift and graceful precision, affording a most beautiful sight to the spectator and the greatest satisfaction to itself, until giddiness comes upon it and brings it to the ground again with a broken leg. It is true that its dangerously powerful legs are also very brittle, but it must be confessed that it does not use them well.

Of the danger that the owner sometimes runs from those powerful limbs — Martin tells some very amusing stories. A sturdy newcomer, some six feet in height, laughed at the warnings that were given him when he set out for a walk and distainfully refused the protection of a tackey—a thorny branch, the dexterous use of which will keep the ostrich at bay —averring that he "was not afraid of a dicky bird!" He was missed and discovered some hours afterward by a search party most uncomfortably perched on the top of an ironstone bowlder and slowly grilling under the African sun, while the dicky bird did sentinel duty up and down, watching him with an evil eye. "Another gentleman had a theory that any creature, however savage, could be subdued—'quelled,' as he said, by the human eye One day he tried to quell one of his own ostriches, with the result that he was presently found in a very pitiable predicament, lying flat on the ground, while the subject of his experiment jumped up and down on him, occasionally varying the treatment by sitting upon him." Doubtless it was safer to lie down than to stand up to be kicked, but to be sat upon as if one were an egg must have been indeed humiliating. Curious, too, is the account that the author gives of the camps or little kingdoms that the ostriches mark out for themselves, with invisible but never to be encroached upon boundaries. Inside that camp it will bear no intrusion, but outside it, in the domain of its neighbor, it is profoundly indifferent to the stranger's wanderings. Nor is it safe for the farmer to presume upon his former acquaintance with any bird, for the ostrich has not wits enough to distinguish an old friend from a new intruder, nor sufficient respect for his owner to except him from his suspicious hostilities, though it would appear that, as a rule, he will manifest a stronger aversion to the Kaffir or Hottentot than a white man.—London Spectator.

A FLASK OF BRANDY WHICH WENT ROUND THE WORLD.—We find the following in the British Workman: "One of the most remarkable of modern travellers was Isaac Sharp, a minister of the Society of Friends, who died in 1897, at the extreme age of ninety years and eight months. When he was seventy years of age he undertook an apostolic missionary journey, in the course of which he visited South Africa, Madagascar, Australasia, the United States, Mexico, etc.

Before he started, a gentleman of his acquaintance, happening to meet him in a railway carriage, asked if he were going to take some brandy with him. Isaac Sharp, who was an abstainer, said he had not thought of doing so. His friend then reminded him of the delicacy of his health, of the extremes of climate to which he would be exposed, and of the difficulty in many places of obtaining medical aid. Then, opening his dressing case, he asked his acceptance of a flask of brandy. Isaac Sharp did not refuse the gift so kindly offered, and took it with him on his travels. Seven years later, after his return, he was addressing a large temperance meeting. Having related the incident of the conversation in the railway carriage, he spoke of the varieties of temperature he had met with (from ice and snow to tropical heat), and of the hardships to which he had been exposed, including sometimes a night's rest with no covering but the starlit sky. Then, with a humorous expression on his genial face, he added, "But the other day, when I came across my friend, I had the pleasure of handing back his kind gift, and of telling him that I had no reason to doubt what the contents of the flask might be, but I had never found a reason for opening it."

THE MESSAGE OF PEACE.

Bid the din of battle cease!
Folded be the wings of fire!
Let your courage conquer peace,
Every gentle heart's desire.

Let the crimson flood retreat!
Blended in the arc of love
Let the flags of nations meet;
Bind the raven, loose the dove.

At the altar that we raise
King and Kaiser may bow down;
Wear the sacred olive crown.

Blinding passion is subdued,
Men discern their common birth
God hath made of kindred blood,
All the peoples of the earth.

High and holy are the gifts
He hath lavished on the race—
Hope that quickens, prayer that lifts,
Honor's meed and beauty's grace.

As in heaven's bright face we look
Let our kindling souls expand;
Let us pledge on Nature's book
Heart to heart and hand to hand.

For the glory that we saw
In the battle flag unfurled,
Let us read Christ's better law—
Fellowship for all the world.
—Julia Ward Howe in S. S. Times.

How Best to Keep up the Interest of our Young People in our Society.

. . . Our manner of worship is the ideally pure for human beings. We meet to worship God, not by following the words of any human being speaking for us, not to hear a discourse prepared as a professional duty, but to "yield ourselves up to the influence of the Divine presence," individually to hear His voice speaking to us, and, if He bids us, to speak as we are moved by the Holy Ghost. This is our ideal. Our basis is silence, because it is by listening in silence that we can best hear what God the Lord has to say to us. I am not saying our method is suited to all Christians, but I maintain we exist to uphold a high, I believe the highest, ideal of worshipping the Father in "spirit and in truth." Where there is a perpetual flow of words sounding in our ears, sins confessed by many who do not feel them, expressions and aspirations that are often not genuine, songs of praise that are frequently only on the lips, we are conscious that, though there is in such systems much that is good and united with true worship, they have at the same time such a tendency to cultivate insincerity, that we are led jealously to wish to preserve the simplicity and beauty of our Friends' meetings, where, in our silence, we are awed by the sense of the Divine Master, who presides at our board, and feeds us with heavenly manna. "Never before," writes one who has joined our Society, "had God's influence revealed itself to me as in those quiet assemblies." And this is not a unique experience. Many testify that they do feel the nearness of the Divine heart communing with their hearts, so that their whole being responds in loving adoration.

In ascertaining whether it be true that "our system, or lack of system, has failed," we must surely ask another question: Is our ideal a delusion? If so, let us abandon it. If, on the other hand, it is the purest conceivable, we must rise to it. It is of the utmost importance that we do not lower our standard to suit the tendency of the day. Such surrender has often been fatal to the spiritual life of a community. It is the most dangerous element that can possibly creep into any religious society, that a good end justifies a degradation of the highest principles. Never, never as Friends, let us be guilty of this. And I venture to say, it is not "our system, or want of system," that has proved a failure; the failure is in ourselves to rise to our ideal. For why is it that, if the system be at fault, such marvellous results followed the formation of the Society, and that it made the position amongst Christian communions which it holds even to-day? Societies arise because of the enthusiasm of workers who are wholly consecrated to God, and they carry the multitude with them. Years after, when all the enthusiasm has died out, the followers look round and wonder why the work does not grow as once it did, and then they fall to complaining of the system.

Our young people, for lack of helpful ministry, are looking naturally with longing eyes at the attractive congregations in other denominations. They hunger after an intelligent, interesting, rousing sermon, they long for the art of singing, for the beauty of hymns, and the soothing tones of an organ, and many are restless under our restrictions. An emotional religion is most attractive. I once heard a young girl, coming out from a ritualistic service, exclaim, "Oh, it makes me feel so religious." But what are the results of these externalities? Christ says, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and surely there is no higher or better test. "What is the fruit?" In all good works Friends are prominent. It is truly astonishing, in looking at present Christian activity, and in reading of the philanthropy of the past, to see how members of our Society have almost invariably been the leaders. As one outside our borders has said, "In every struggle for liberty, humanity, education, and the personal protection of the weak, you will find a Quaker in the foreground." Then in the different churches we find that those who have attained to the highest degree of ritual have contained the largest proportion of only professing Christians, while the Friends and Moravians, who acknowledge Jesus Christ as the only Head of their church, not theoretically, but actually, and who have had little or no ritual, have had fewer, comparatively speaking, amongst their numbers who have not been earnest followers of Christ.

When we see so much stress and attention given in some denominations to the sermon, it must strike the thoughtful observer as a remarkable fact that the Society of Friends, who have kept preaching in such a subordinate position, have yet shown to the world so large a proportion of spiritually minded, upright, and consistent Christians. We believe this arises from cultivating the habit of listening to the voice of God, rather than to the voice of man.

But the lack of ministry is an indication of lack of life, and the lamentable fact is that the ministry which is given is mostly that which cannot touch the cultivated and thoughtful young people. They must have something more than emotion which often stifles thought, and truths [are best understood when] expressed in the language of the day. With their freedom and belief in the progressive teaching of the Holy Spirit, Friends ought to be foremost in meeting the difficulties of t times. They have never been hampered wi a Miltonic theology, but have ever believe that the "Spirit of Truth," as Christ has to us, "shall guide into all the truth;" but whe there is no power in the ministry the you will, of course, go where they will receive mo help. Distance, no doubt, lends enchantme to the view, and they hardly realize that wh they may gain in one direction they may lo in another; but we cannot keep up their inte est in our meetings for worship if, on looki to those older than themselves, they do not s a deep spiritual life, an example they will well to follow, a tender earnestness and spi of encouragement towards themselves, and desire to lead others into the truth. Wh can they think of those who, professing to b lieve in the glorious gospel, [seem indiffere to its spread]? They will judge, and natura so, that any organization which produces su indifference must be at fault.

It is very important, however, to rememb that no change of organization will put n life into souls, no change of methods can crease the spiritual tone of the community. is the old story—a man's surroundings will improve him, but he will improve his surrou ings. System will not make a healthy churc only men and women fired with love to Chr and souls, and ready to do and dare anythi for Him, as the early Friends were, and ca on their work as God dictates, will effect migh results. In a recent article in the Brit Friend, the writer says: "The remedy will found, if ever it is found, in the acceptance their responsibilities and privileges of th who have had advantages in their early yea If these men and women would yield to preparing and vitalizing grace of the H Spirit, their gifts and talents would be laid the altar of dedication for the service of church." How true this is! But to yield o selves with continued submission to God's le ings is no easy thing; and, dear friends, let be very honest, as in God's sight, and see i is not shrinking from this, and what it may volve, that is leading many to look to a trai ministry to relieve them from any personal sponsibility in the matter. During the Jew dispensation there were sin offerings, wh part was reserved for the priest; peace of ings, where part was consumed by the offe and his friends; and burnt offerings, where whole was yielded up to God. We are of ready with our sin offerings and our peace ferings, but we do not like offering the bu offering, and yielding up ourselves entirely God, to be used as He wills; but this is w matters must come to if we are to witness Him.

I would say to those who have so much sponsibility in keeping up the interest of young people in the Society, and to the yo people themselves who really long to do w is right, that if our hearts are yielded so we are ready to be "faithful in occupying talent received" our meetings cannot fai interest. . . . . But I believe there i undefined and most mistaken idea that cer people are used as channels through whom speaks without any exercise on their own p and if words do not come thus they ima they are not called to witness for Him in way. Moses said he could not speak, he

"a slow tongue." Who, however, can quote thing Aaron said? whereas the Pentateuch full of the eloquence of Moses. And why is s? Moses submitted to the training of God, ened to His voice, and though, at first, mmering and trembling, the Spirit qualified n to be a teacher. God does not accept the n mighty in his own eyes, but the humble, mbling soul ready to hearken to Him; and, nember, the word "hearken" means the act "acute, vital, profound, fervent attention." must be in an attitude of eagerness to rken. There is no easy method of listening of speaking. Let none imagine they can be gaged in business all the week, in personal usements and social activities and then place mselves down suddenly at meeting to the fication of the people or of themselves. There are certain indispensable conditions which alone we can carry the Word of Life others, and all will involve sacrifice. We must be much alone with God. We must give ourselves to [truth seeking] l meditation. We must "pray without ceasing." Let me amplify these points briefly. First, n, we must be much alone with God—no ond-hand knowledge will avail. We must w Him through personal contact; withdraw selves from the world, as Christ did, again again leaving his followers to be alone with Father. We find that all who have been sen to be leaders in any sense have had ir seasons of retirement.

"If chosen men could never be alone
In deep mid silence, open-doored to God,
No greatness ever had been dreamed or done."

We must rise to the Mount, as Moses did, be absorbed in celestial visions, warmed n the love of God, if we would speak to the ple. The cold professor of religion is, as been said, "the deadliest enemy of the rch."

We do not grow physically strong hout exercising our bodily organs, and we not grow spiritually strong without exerng our spiritual faculties. This needs faith, severance and concentration. What was secret of the spiritual power of St. Francis, Bernard, Thomas á Kempis, Samuel Ruthrd, George Fox, John Woolman, Brother rence and many more? Study, meditation prayer. Paul, in writing to Timothy, says: editate upon these things, that thy profit- may appear to all." If we would have an vision, we must turn aside from the things earth and seek the presence of God, and this it is needful to give up much that armless, but not helpful to the Divine life. at I want so earnestly to impress upon you s this: There is no power in the world so reaching as personal holiness. A life wholly ded up to God awakens energies of which ave no suspicion. But we must be crucified with Him, rise with Him, abide in Him, feed Him, talk to Him, if we would draw others now our Saviour. Is this what we are striving after? Do we desire to lead men and en to Christ, to build up the Church of , to be one of those whose spiritual influence ways felt?

e are dissatisfied with the present state things, and we do not wonder at the lack nterest amongst our young Friends; but the only way to remedy it is, not by looking at others and seeing where they fail, the old to the young, and the young to the old, but by realizing our individual responsibility, and seeing to it that we each dedicate ourselves to God, asking, "What wouldst Thou have me to do?"

I greatly fear that the secret of much of the questioning and criticising of to-day arises from the desire to be the same spiritual power as of old without the same individual sacrifice. But the one is quite impossible without the other. Christ's teaching is emphatic on this point, and all history testifies to the truth of his words. We may have to go through much agony, and probably shall, if we are to speak for the Master; and if we would witness for Him by personal holiness we must drink of the cup He drank of, and be baptized with the baptism He was baptized with. Browning says:

"There is a way
'Tis hard for flesh to tread therein, imbued
With frailty—hopeless, if indulgence first
Have ripened inborn germ of sin to strength.
Wilt thou adventure for my sake and man's?"

It is just because our ideal is so high that it cannot be maintained without sacrifice; and if we are not prepared to rise to the spiritual stature of our forefathers the sooner we cease to be a Society the better. The history of the past is full of inspiration, the Christ-given principles upon which our Society is based are perfect, and appeal to our noblest aspirations. Our strength to rise is not in ourselves, it is in Christ. He is not doing what He would in our Society because of our cold-heartedness and want of faith. "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief" is written over many of our meetings. Don't let our sight and sense overmaster us. Let us wrestle with God as did Jacob of old, holding back nothing, and I am confident that we shall rejoice over renewed spiritual life, increased usefulness, and souls brought into the Kingdom of God. Let us seek each day for the power to testify of those things which our eyes have seen and our hands have handled of the word of life, and God will use us to an extent of which we never dreamed.

I know of no other way in which either old or young can keep up their interest in our Society than by going back, it need not be to the outward forms of old, but to the whole-hearted consecration of self to Christ and the daily, hourly abiding in Him.—Georgina King Lewis in London Friend.

BOOKER T. WASHINGTON.—Booker T. Washington was born in Franklin County, Virginia, but he does not know when—no record having been kept of colored children's birth in the days of slavery.

His first memory is of clinging to his mother's skirts while she shouted hallelujah for her freedom. Whether it was under this mother's instruction or that of his teachers in the colored schools, or both, the boy evidently grew up with a conscience and an idea of doing things well.

He worked in a coal-mine after he was old enough to earn his living, but his hunger for knowledge drove him to study whenever and wherever he could get at a book.

Dr. John F. Cowan, in the "Christian Endeavor World," tells how Booker heard of a place where students worked for their education, and how he finally entered Hampton Normal Institute.

He arrived there afoot, shabby, and covered with dust. The faculty did not know what to think of him, and doubted whether they could offer him anything beyond a meal of victuals and a chance to wash himself. But at last they concluded to give him a room to sweep, and accordingly a broom was put into his hands.

He swept the floor once, and looked at his work. It did not satisfy him. He went over it a second time, carefully brushing out all the corners; but another inspection did not convince him that he had done a perfect job. He swept that room a third time, and then he concluded he had done the best he could.

Soon after one of the lady teachers came in and took note of his performance. A quick survey showed her that at least the floor was clean. She touched the walls and chairs with her white handkerchief in search of dust, but if she found any she did not say so. The next day he was admitted as a student at Hampton Institute. His broom was his certificate.

Booker continued to use the broom, and pay his way with it, when not handling the hoe and spade to the same purpose on the school farm, climbing at the same time in his studies till he became the representative man in his class. Every task he undertook, whether in learning or labor, was as carefully finished as his first.

And when, in 1881, General Armstrong sent him to teach school in a Tuskegee shanty, he faced, and felt, as he had never felt before, the helpless ignorance of his race, and resolved that he would try to sweep some of it away. The story of his thoroughness and his success is now part of our national history.—"Youth's Companion."

IN the visible church, it is no strange thing to find plants that our Heavenly Father has not planted. It is implied that whatever is good in the church is of God's planting. But let the husbandman be ever so careful, his ground will cast forth weeds of itself, more or less, and there is an enemy busy sowing tares. What is corrupt, though of God's permitting, is not of His planting; He sows nothing but good seed in His field. Let us not, therefore, be deceived, as if all must needs be right that we find in the church, and all those persons and things, our Father's plants that we find in our Father's garden. "By their fruits you shall know them." Those plants that are not of God's planting, shall not be of His protecting, but shall undoubtedly be rooted up. What is not of God shall not stand. What things are unscriptural will wither and die of themselves, or be justly exploded by the churches; however, in the great day these tares that offend will be bundled for the fire. What is become of the Pharisees and their traditions. They are long since abandoned; but the gospel of truth is great, and will remain. It cannot be rooted up.—Matthew Henry.

IT is instructive as it is remarkable that on only two occasions did our Lord create food, and miraculously provide money on only one—leaving the law of God not only to its righteousness but beneficent course. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread."—Dr. Guthrie.

The coming of the Beloved Son even in the body prepared was "to save his people from sin," and his coming to the soul in his spiritual manifesting is a gracious evidence of the inexpressible love of the Father to the human family seeking that which had been lost, restoring that which had fallen, and preserving all that they might be presented faultless. God had not made men angels that they could not fall, but endowed them with faculties by the proper exercise whereof they would be preserved in obedience to the Divine will.

To these business meetings, which from the periods at which they were held were called Monthly Meetings were committed the care and oversight of all claiming a membership with them, which pastoral service they were to perform conformably with the injunction, "If thy brother shall trespass against thee go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone, if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." At the first none but the more faithful and experienced were engaged in these meetings. Being the first business Meetings they are also the most essential meetings on which the whole superstructure of the Society rests. They are the guardians of its membership, receiving, retaining or disowning, as the unity of the Spirit of the Master shows to be right. The preservation of this bond of unity as the cord to hold them together cannot be too strongly urged. Such was the importance of it that George Fox in an epistle of Christian caution advised "That no testimony of denial against any should be issued until every member of the meeting had fully discharged his duty toward them," (or nearly these words). To carry this into effect after individual labor was ineffectual to restore the erring, the matter was mentioned to the meeting, or, "told to the church," and a request sent to the offender to meet with them, when the united strength of the body very frequently was exerted to restore, and successful in the effort. Similar to this appears to have been the practice of the primitive church. "If a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one." The welfare of a fellow-being was a matter of too much importance to be entrusted to any one person hired for the purpose, and was too closely connected with the health and life of the whole body to be relegated to others. In the physical body, if one member is injured, all the others put their capacity under the direction of the head to bring again, if possible, to the normal condition.

To these Monthly Meetings other subjects connected with the well-being of the members were assigned. Some of them while of a more individual character, were at the same time interwoven with the good of the whole.

The care of those whose pecuniary circumstances were such as to require the assistance of those more greatly favored, was from the unsettled state of affairs of much need, and especially for the relief of those under sufferings for the testimony of Truth—the care that marriages should be accomplished with circumspection consistent with its character of a Divine institution, and various other subjects of local importance. To these as of more extensive influence was also that of the acknowledgement of the vocal ministry, that none should be allowed to appear as ministers to speak on behalf of the Society whose lives and conversation did give evidence of obedience to Divine requirings; and to this at a later day was added that respecting the eldership. The proper service of an elder being as clearly a qualification from the Head of the Church as that of a minister; and where appointments to this important duty have been made without the needful preparation it has resulted in more injury than benefit to the Society.

It does not appear that the work of George Fox in the organization of the Society extended beyond that of Monthly Meetings; not that he undervalued the advice, counsel or admonition of the larger bodies, but was sensible that numbers of themselves did not constitute strength. The larger Quarterly or Yearly Meetings having only advisory service would be of benefit under the direction of Christ, the Head and Teacher of his people, from the united experience of such servants as had been baptized with his baptism. It was no less a concern with this highly gifted man to avoid the undue exercise of disciplinary authority, as enjoined by the blessed Son who said to his immediate followers: "The princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them, but it shall not be so among you," etc., than to plant his righteous testimony against libertinism and all kinds of Ranterism. Episcopalianism, the government by bishop and clergy, was no greater sin than unbridled Socinianism with its fleshly lusts. Both were equally antagonistic to true Christianity, as it had been unfolded to his seeking soul in prayerful desire for a knowledge of heavenly wisdom.

It is therefore to be hoped that the establishment of a local Monthly Meeting will preserve also a testimony to the invigorating power of those principles of religious liberty for which the noble Quaker martyrs laid down their lives on the Commons of Boston. With minds enlightened by the life of Christ who is come to enlighten the soul which receives Him, they demonstrated the correctness of the remark of Miles Coverdale, who in the first edition of Scriptures printed in England enumerated the sentiment "that a measure of the Spirit in which they were written is necessary to their right understanding." With this inspiration within in their hearts they were able to confound their priestly enemies, whose last resort was to the power of the oppressor.

There need be no controversy on this point, yet the college bred student with his textual criticisms, will look through the gold-rimmed spectacles of his education and exclaim:

> "I've read it, sir, as well as you
> And will again affirm it blue."

And here is the beginning of strife; this is the soil in which contention, division and separation have their growth. But in the Church of Christ, the true Society of Friends, it cannot be so; for "One is your Master, and all ye are brethren." The obedient soul is humbled before Him patiently waiting to hear the Divine Word, that Word which was with God in the beginning, which waves and winds obey and hearing it, are abased, humbly prostrate in his presence, adoring the wisdom, majesty and power of the Most High.

For "THE FRIEND."

From Letters of Joseph S. Elkinton.

My beloved friend William Evans, in some late numbers of THE FRIEND, gave some ac count of what he witnessed whilst we were t gether amongst the Dukhobortsi in Canad and has supplemented it with statements co cerning their creed.

He left Yorkton at an early hour on th twenty-first of Sixth Month, and in the cours of the day I met with William Halstead, who I had met at the Methodist Conference in Wi nipeg, where an invitation had been extende to give such information as we were in posse sion of concerning the Dukhobors. W. H. w desirous of having more detailed converse tha could properly be given in the conference, a the opportunity being again renewed, and h appearing like a solid religious man, and ha been a successful farmer, I invited him to g with me into the camp. We met with a Ru sian on the ground with whom I had consider ble conversation, as he could speak Englis he had no previous knowledge of the Dukh bors, but was evidently in sympathy with the and was desirous of becoming more acquainte with the principles of the Society of Friends

Quite a number had left the camp durin the past week to go to the settlements, a about three hundred and sixty had come fro Brandom, having been quartered there sin the first arrival; among these was John Ma hortoff, who might be said to be their patriarc He said he was ninety years of age: he is st vigorous and alive in the truth. His mem ory went back to seeing Stephen Grellet 1818.

They had been weakened by their best m being still in exile, but they have those wi them who were convinced of and suffered f the truth whilst in the navy and army, a since in exile, and now released. John Ma hortoff is one of these. The answers he ga to the Methodist minister and the trust a faith he manifested in our great and comm Creator was a wonderful testimony to the pow of God in the support of one of His childre This was a remarkable occasion and I did n want it dissipated by entering into ordina conversation, so we retired from it to c rooms.

At a meeting held in the afternoon of th day, the assembly formed almost a comple circle, with John Makhortoff near the cent as the chief arranger and respondent to abo all that was said, it being their practice have a respondent to what may be spoken s tence by sentence. Ivan Verigan, an el amongst them, had been the chief responde on former occasions, but he deferred to patriarch that day.

I adverted to the meeting lately held w them, and the desire to meet with those w came there within a few days, as also to kindly letter received from the brethren quarantine, and the matters contained in lett from John Bellows concerning the contri tions made towards paying the expenses of two hundred that could not get to Bato timely for the last ship, as also to the hope view John Bellows had expressed of the pr pect of those now exiled in Siberia being leased. I also offered what I felt to arise deeper religious way to the following impo to consider whether they were brought on consequence of our mistakes, but it might that neither we nor our parents had sinned, t that the glory of God might be manifested His power in supporting us in affliction, as o in a restoration or delivering, as He saw et, and alluded to the case of the blind man recorded in the New Testament.

William Bellows, son of John Bellows, made ne appropriate remarks; I then opened the y for William Halstead to tell of his experi-ce in contending with the difficulties in neer life. He took a little boy and stood h by his side inside of the ring or circle, and n told that fifty-five years ago when about size of that boy he came from England, l his father bought land at one dollar per e, and they worked and put up a small house, n a larger one and afterwards a stone house. father and mother were both killed by ac-ent, and the farm had to be sold and they l hardships, but by industry and the blessing the Lord they had been prospered, and he ired their encouragement in the hope that h the Divine blessing they would be pros-ed and the country developed. When he rd that the Society of Friends in England in the United States were taking an inter-in them he felt they must be a good people. se remarks with what he added in a serious ctionate way, were accompanied with a d feeling.

A Presbyterian superintendent of First-day ools, spoke to the import, that when the dren of Israel were in affliction they called God who made a way for their deliverance, after they were brought into the promised l they did not cleave to their God, and did teach their children as they should, and it ired care in coming into new countries the children did not get out of the way, he would ask one question, this he repeated e: "Do you teach your children?" John Mar-off called out, "Bring the boy!" a woman I supposed was his daughter pointed out-the ring, when a boy between six or seven rs of age was brought in, and stood by his ndfather. He assumed a devout attitude, I could see that he did not falter as he ressed himself. Anna Carousa, a Russian lan who can speak English, told me that he ated the ten commandments, and to use own language "without a hitch." No other ver was made to the question, nor were any r questions asked. There were several imonies in Russian to the import, that it is in Christ that makes people one in spirit, that Christ is the foundation for us all.

hen I said I supposed we had stood on the nd as long as was best, it being a little p, John Makhortoff said, "we would like to a psalm." After that was done, he nodded ne of the women who slowly and with a sure of reverence repeated the hymn or n, so that all that understood Russian t know its meaning, for in singing they t not always know the meaning of what sung. I was glad to see the point taken the subject matter was of more account the tune.

ere were probably four hundred assembled. e Hilkoff kindly did the interpreting.

A. Hilkoff felt that he could not go with the north colony, which would probably six days journey, as there was much busi-ness for him to see to in Yorkton before taking passage for Europe. He said he would select a Dukhobor for a guide, which he did, who though he could not speak English, was a sweet spirited man whose company I enjoyed, and he was very faithful.

In the evening I was present in a religious opportunity in a tent where was a corpse that had a sweet expression. I had visited the man the week before when he was in a suffering condition, he had been sick in Cyprus, and too much exposed in the wet whilst at work in Canada. It was the third death for that camp which, considering the size of it, and the time it had been there, did not strike me as an excessive death rate.

At the hotel in the evening, we were gratified with a call from a company of Dukhobortsi, asking for a proportion of the Russian testaments, which William Bellows had the satisfaction of handing out; they had been forwarded by his father from Friends in England.

In the decision to start next morning I suggested seven o'clock, as I understood it to be a question of about fifty miles to the next lodging place at Fort Pelly, a Hudson Bay trading place. I had a letter from the agent at Yorkton to the storekeeper, asking him to give us comfortable lodging and entertainment. It was however 8.40 before all was ready for the start. We had a light open wagon with a valise, box of provisions, dishes, etc., bag of oats, blankets, robes, gum-boots,etc., which with four men filled the wagon. The team was a good one even if I had seen both horses on their sides in the mire on a previous journey, in endeavoring to pull the baggage wagon out of a slough; one of the horses came from the Rocky Mountains.

We saw something of pioneer experience for ourselves and others, wind, rain with hail, that drove us into a thicket for the time being. One man we passed on the prairie had unharnessed his horses and was under his wagon, where the supposition was he had been all night. One team we saw with a whole family of Dukhobors, was fast in a place where the bridge had been carried away, our driver protested against stopping to see them out, but we insisted that help must be given, and whilst the men worked with the team, it was interesting to see the women carry a pole strong enough to walk across, and then with another pole in hand walk across the one they had managed to get across the stream or slough.

Notes from Others.

A report from Venezuela says that 16,000,000,000 birds were slaughtered last year for their plumage, and that many of the most beautiful varieties of birds are on the way to extinction.

To Make Women Preachers.—The Chicago Theological Seminary, which is said to be the oldest institution of its kind in the West has decided to open its doors to women on equal terms with men at the beginning of the new academic year. This school has for some years permitted women to attend lectures, as have several other theological seminaries, but it now abolishes all distinctions as to sex.

Mormons Persecuted.—Unusual antagonism to the Mormon church is being exhibited in various parts of the South, where considerable support for this sect exists. President Benjamin E. Rich, who has charge of the Southern propaganda, with headquarters at Chattanooga, Tenn., reports that four Mormon church buildings have recently been burnt by incendiaries, in Kentucky, two being fired during services. One church was wrecked with axes and pulled down, so as to prevent the collection of fire insurance. Masked mobs threatened the elders with death if they did not leave the country.—Pathfinder.

The American Universities.— Figures recently compiled show that in the ten leading universities in the United States there are 24,000 students and over 2,600 professors, the average being 9 students to each professor. Harvard University leads, with 3,900 students and 411 professors; next comes the University of Michigan, with 3,200 students and 222 instructors, and next the University of Pennsylvania, with 2,835 students and 260 professors. Then follow, in order: Yale, with 2,500 students and 255 professors; California, 2,400 students, 286 professors; Chicago, 2,300 students, 212 professors; Columbia, 2,000 students, 328 professors; Northwestern, 2,000 students, 222 professors; Cornell, 2,000 students, 328 professors; and Johns Hopkins, 640 students, 125 professors.

The morning Record says: "Desolation describes the scene to-night at Walstein, within whose walls lies the body of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, the agnostic. About his bier cling three women—his widow and his two daughters. To them the form on the bier is all that is left of the father and husband. They have no hope for future union, no consolation in Christian faith, no solace in religion. The dreariness, the utter loneliness has overpowered those whom the great infidel left to mourn him, and they have again refused to surrender to the incinerating urn, the one tangible thing between them and the eternity of separation. Strong men declared that nothing had ever appealed to them so strongly before, for religion and Christianity, as the utter desolation and hopelessness of that family of mourners. Not a note of consolation, not a prayer for sympathy, or help, or mercy."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Fire has destroyed the business portion of Victor, Colorado, causing a loss estimated at $2,000,000.

The recent hurricane in the West Indies has proved to be one of the most destructive for many years. In its passage along the coast of the United States it has been attended with winds having a velocity of sixty to eighty miles an hour, causing high tides and rough seas. Many vessels have been delayed and some injured during the tempestuous weather. Its effects on the islands of Porto Rico have been very serious. In an appeal to the citizens of Philadelphia by its mayor, it is stated that more than 100,000 people there are without shelter, and that they need help in rebuilding their houses, as also clothing and food. Contributions of money and supplies are urgently wanted. The Panther is expected to leave Philadelphia on the 22nd inst. with supplies on board valued at nearly $50,000 for the sufferers there. Following the cyclone, floods and famine in Porto Rico it is feared an epidemic will be caused by decaying bodies among the debris.

Secretary Ewing Winslow, of the Anti-Imperialist League, in an interview at Boston, said it was not likely that the League would organize a national party and put a ticket in the field, but it is proposed to call a national convention in the Tenth Month to demonstrate the opposition of the country to the present policy of the Administration.

A despatch from Albany, N. Y. of the 18th inst., says: "The fires which have been raging in the Adirondacks for the past week have made great headway, and reports from various sections show that they have already reached a greater extent than did those of ten years ago, which laid waste thousands of acres. No estimate of the damages can be made, but the officials say that unless heavy rains come to the State's rescue they will amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars."

The New York Herald says: "The advance of three cents a pound in the price of beef this week, with intimations of a further rise in prospect, is matter of serious importance in a vast number of modest households. Rightly or wrongly, the higher price is attributed to the Cattle Trust, which virtually controls the supply and has a practical monopoly of the transportation facilities, not only between the Western markets and the seaboard, but also of the export trade."

Electric motor cars of the third rail variety have begun to run on the Fifth Avenue Elevated Road in Brooklyn. The change is hailed with much satisfaction by the public as doing away with many of the incidental annoyances of the old steam locomotives, besides reducing the running time.

The Naval Hydrographic Office has received valuable information respecting ocean currents through the medium of floating bottles, thrown overboard by steamships and recovered by passing vessels, which report the exact points at which the bottles are picked up. One bottle was tossed overboard from the steamship Fuerst Bismarck on Fifth Month 1st, 1898, about 350 miles south-east of Cape Race, and recovered on Eighth Month 1st, in the vicinity of Gluckstadt, on the Elbe. The distance between the two points, following the route through the English Channel, is about 2400 miles, giving twenty-six miles as the lowest possible estimate of the daily average velocity with which the bottle travelled eastward. In conducting its experiments the Navy Department has had the co-operation of the Russian Government, which on the cruises of two of its vessels had thrown in the sea 703 bottles, of which thirty have been recovered and reported. Taken collectively, the paths followed by these floating bottles give a good idea of the drift currents of the North Atlantic. The motion of the waters seems to be westerly, as is evidenced by the destination of the numerous bottles cast adrift between Madeira and Cape San Roque, all of which ultimately found their way to the Windward Islands, the Bahamas, or to the western shores of the Gulf of Mexico.

A commission appointed by the President to investigate the nature of yellow fever reports that a micro-organism discovered by Professor Sanarelli of Bologna, Italy, and named by him "bacillus icteroides," is the cause of yellow fever, and that its ready control by the processes of disinfection is assured, also that there is a reasonable possibility of the production of an anti serum of great potency for the protection of man against this disease.

A despatch from Kansas City, Mo., of the 18th inst., says: "Contracts were closed here to-day for the sale to a syndicate of Eastern commission merchants of seventy carloads of eggs, now in store at Topeka, Abilene and Concordia, Kansas. The eggs are to be shipped by three special trains next week. The sellers will realize sixteen cents a dozen, and the eggs will retail in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and other cities, at a little over twenty cents. The deal is estimated to cover 10,-080,000 eggs.

There were 381 deaths in this city last week, which is 64 less than the previous week and 65 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 107 were under one year of age; 193 were males and 178 females: 39 died of consumption; 34 of cholera infantum; 29 of marasmus; 24 of heart diseases; 23 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 16 of cancer; 13 of apoplexy; 13 of inanition; 11 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of old age; 11 from casualties; 7 of typhoid fever, and 5 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c. — U. S. 2's, 100½ a 101; 4's, reg., 112¼ a 112¾; coupon, 113 a 114; new 4's, reg., 130 a 131; 5's, 111⅞ a 112; 3's 108½ a 109.

COTTON sold in a small way to spinners, on a basis of 6$\frac{5}{16}$c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.00 a $2.15; Pennsylvania roller, straight, old, $3.00 a $3.15; do. do., straight, new, $3.10 a $3.30; Western winter, old, straight, $3.20 a $3.40; do., do., new, straight, $3.15 a $3.35; spring, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; city mills, straight, $3.25 a $3.40.

RYE FLOUR.—$3.00 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 72 a 72¼c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 36¾ a 37c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 27 a 28c.

FOREIGN.—Colonel Picquart, who by direction of the French Cabinet had investigated the case of Dreyfus, told the court-martial at Rennes that his official inquiry established a strong suspicion that Esterhazy was the guilty party, and, consequently that Captain Dreyfus was innocent of the crime of high treason.

Outbreaks of a violent character growing out of the Dreyfus case took place in Paris on First-day the 20th. Many persons were injured, and much property destroyed.

An expedition under Walter Wellman, which left Tromsoe, Norway, in the Sixth Month, 1898, to explore Franz Josef Land, has returned to Tromsoe, having successfully completed their explorations and discovered important new lands and many islands. No trace was found of the missing æronaut Prof. Andree. An attempt to reach the North pole failed.

Prof. Bunsen, the eminent German chemist and physicist died at Heidelberg on the 16th instant, aged eighty-nine years. Among the improvements in the arts and sciences which have followed his researches are the hot blast in iron furnaces, the Bunsen gas burner and battery cell, thermometers for measuring very high temperatures, and methods of spectrum analysis, by which several new elements have been discovered.

A despatch of the 16th from London says that Prof. Marconi, in his experiments with wireless telegraphy at Dover, met with complete success, the messages passing through several miles of cliff and twelve miles across the sea.

The third Congress of Zionists assembled at Basle, Switzerland, on the 15th instant, with 300 delegates present, including a number of Americans and English. In his inaugural address, Dr. Herzl, who presided, declared that one of the primary objects of the movement was to acquire a charter from the Turkish Government authorizing settlements in Palestine. He added that Emperor William's reception of a Jewish deputation at Jerusalem placed the legality and loyalty of the Zionist movement beyond question.

It is said that almost every nation, with the exception of the United States and Great Britain, is overtaxed to meet the expense of maintaining its army and navy.

Bacteriological experiments made at Lisbon prove that the epidemic at Oporto is bubonic plague. The United States Consul at Lisbon reports that a few cases of plague have appeared in Lisbon and that no trains can pass the Spanish frontier. The Madrid Government urges all Spaniards now in Portugal to remain there, with a view of preventing the spread of the plague.

The Church Missionary Society of London has received a report stating that 40,000 persons have died of famine on the east coast of Africa.

A despatch from St. Petersburg says Emperor Nicholas has issued the following imperial order to the Russian Minister of Finance: "Owing to the great possessions of Russia in Europe and Asia it has been possible with the help of God, to effect a rapprochement between the peoples of the West and Southwest and East. Through the friendly attitude of China we have succeeded in attaining our historic aim, having obtained the use of two Chinese harbors, Ta-Lien-Wan and Port Arthur, with a large territory, whereby an outlet for the Siberian Railway to the Yellow Sea is secured. Thanks to the wisdom of the Chinese Government we shall, through railways in course of construction, be united to China, a result which gives all nations the immeasurable gain of easy communication, and lightens the operations of the world's trade. In our unwearying care for the general weal we have deemed it necessary, after completing the railway, to declare Ta-Lien-Wan an open port during the whole period of the treaty for the merchant ships of all nations, and to build a new city in the neighborhood of the said port."

It is announced from Buenos Ayres that a treaty will be signed by Brazil, Argentina and Chile, agreeing to refer all difficulties between the three countries to arbitration. The three Governments will also agree to reduce their military and naval expenses."

Western Australia has passed a bill giving women the right to vote.

A despatch of the 21st from Seattle says: "Japan's new law regulating all faiths and beliefs has gone into effect and much comment has arisen in consequence. A copy of the regulations has been received at the Japanese Consulate here. According to it all sects, pagan or Christian, are placed under the absolute control of a local Governor. The regulations even go so far as to demand detailed information regarding the pastor."

President Schurman, of the Philippine Commission, has returned home. In an interview he said: "It would be wise to adopt a course or plan which would enable the Government to maintain law and order and at the same time give the Filipinos no cause for discontent. It will be a surprise to many Americans to know that the educated Filipino is the equal of any other civilized people in the world. Americans must deal gently with the Filipino. He is entitled to sympathetic consideration. There are many pleasing traits in his character, his home life is exemplary and as a class he is well disposed toward his neighbor or his superior. Once his confidence is gained, if dealt with in a frank, straightforward manner, the misunderstanding will all be dissipated, and the Filipino will realize that the American is his friend."

The Treasury Bureau of Statistics at Washington states that the commerce of the west coast of South America now amounts to $100,000,000 annually, and of this sum but $15,000,000 is with the United States. The imports of Chile, Peru, Ecuador and Bolivia amounted in 1897 to over $50,000,000, and of this amount less than $5,000,000 was from the United States. Thus, in that part of the commerce in which the United States producers and manufacturers are most interested, the export trade, the United States now obtains less than 10 per cent. of the trade of the Pacific coast of South America.

Andrew D. White, United States Ambassador to Germany, who was President of the American Peace Commission at The Hague, has written the following in regard [to] the result of the Conference: "In my opinion great go[od] was accomplished, far more, in fact, than any of us dar[ed] expect or even hope when we came together. As to d[is]armament, everybody really thinking upon the subj[ect] must see that a good system of arbitration must come fir[st] and that then, when arbitration has diminished the like[li]hood of war, the argument for cutting down forces a[nd] armaments is greatly strengthened. The logical ord[er] then, is first arbitration and next disarmament. The gre[at] point gained is that, whereas formerly an arbitration co[urt] could only be provided after long correspondence betwe[en] Cabinets and negotiations between Ministers and deba[tes] in parliamentary bodies, and hunting for proper Judg[es] and discussions as to procedure and a thousand other [de]lays, just when time was most precious, the Conferen[ce] has given to the world an arbitration tribunal as an act[ive] and permanent institution, with Judges, procedure, offic[ers] of the court, place of meeting and accessories all p[ro]vided.

Edifying Correspondence.

In perusing the printed minutes for the year the New England Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Westerly, R. I., and of Canada Yearly Meeting, held at Pickering, Ontario, we have noticed to give a still wider circulation to several expressions found in their epistolary correspondence.

To New England Friends:

"A renewed sense of the importance of waiting for and experiencing Divine assistance in the transaction of the business coming before us has weightily been felt amongst us, and especially the sending of fraternal greetings to our Yearly Meetings. We do most earnestly desire that the preparation of these may be under Divine direction, lest they degenerate into a mere formality.—Western Yearly Meeting.

"'any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." The prevalent temptation of this day is a worldly spirit; thus its friendships, manners and maxims are opposed to the nature of the kingdom of heaven, and the advancement in the hearts of men. We live in a land abundantly blessed with the good things of this life, where the means of obtaining the necessities, and even luxuries, are largely present, so that we are peculiarly exposed in this direction to the temptation of settling in ease and a forgetfulness of God; so that with the cares of bread and abundance of idleness, the love enters the heart, causing it to be lifted up and impatient of the restraint of the cross, by opening the door for a departure from the simplicity and self-denial which was so conspicuous among us in former days, and which must always mark a faithful adherence to the doctrines of the Gospel.—Ohio.

"It is those branches alone that abide not in the True Vine that are to be taken away; but those that are found so abiding, are to be purged that they may be made still more fruitful. These purifications unto which we are subjected, though sometimes deeply hurting to our human nature, are the means our Heavenly Father uses to draw us away from our own dependence that our faith may not stand in human wisdom, but in Him alone. —Iowa.

It is our earnest desire that a spirit of love and humility may more and more diffuse itself among us, and influence our hearts so that we may be able to seek peace and pursue it. We are called upon by our Lord and Master to love one another, and certainly there is a soil where envy, malice and hatred cannot live, but will wither and die. Then, dear Friends, let us remember that to be made perfect in love is a high attainment, or state of excellence, and not reached but by the sacrifice of all our selfish passions that stand in the way of that heavenly love flowing in our hearts, making us to feel as children of the one household of faith.—Kansas.

We deeply sympathize with you in what must prove most painful to you, that the sons of your beloved and highly favored country are engaged in a war whose purpose is the destruction of their fellow-men. You, with us, well know how nobler far it is to be found as humble, suppliant servants of the Prince of Peace, breathing love and good will towards all men. The weapons which we are called to wield are not carnal, but mighty through the power of Him who has called us out of darkness into light to the pulling down of the strongholds of Satan, and none of the least of these whereby he afflicts men are war, oppression, intemperance and the like. May we, with you, then, be found following the Lamb, clothed in his gentle, peaceable spirit, that our spirits be not defiled by any exultation on our part over the groans, sufferings and death of those whom the world regards as enemies, for they, like us, are poor sinners, whom Christ loves and for whom He died, and whom He commands us to love. God rules over all, and it may please Him to overrule evil for good, but this neither justifies the doer of evil, nor does it exempt him from the punishment meted out to the breaker of the Divine law. May we, with you, then, be imbued with a holy zeal, as power from on high is vouchsafed, to let the light of the Gospel of peace shine in us and through us in all our thoughts, words, and actions; thus will our hearts be kept in Christ's peace, as we are found walking with and in the presence of him who once called himself "a meek and lowly" Saviour—Canada.

The Lord has all power both in heaven and in earth, and He makes his light to break forth with power to the healing of the nations, but he designs to use his servants as instruments in his hand in the enlarging of his kingdom among the children of men; and for this purpose He requires a faithful people, steadfast in the truth, described in Holy Scripture as "men who can keep rank," signifying a careful training in the school of Christ, by giving heed to his law written on the heart and obeying the pointings of his finger. These must needs be, as He was, separate from the spirit of the world. They walk by the law of love, and this love is the fulfilling of the law.—Canada.

He, by his spirit, will lead us into all truth, and teach us all things pertaining to the salvation of our souls, and as we are found in Him, walking in obedience to his spirit, which maketh manifest his Divine will to each and every heart, God, who by his presence sanctifies our souls, justifies those who thus receive and believe in his only begotten Son, whom He once did send in the flesh to declare and to do Divine counsel and will, and whom He now sends, as He comes, in spirit, to draw us to himself and to make us such as he would have us to be, holy in heart, life and conversation. —Canada.

FROM EPISTLES TO THE WOMENS' YEARLY MEETING.—It is with feelings of wonder and deep reverence that we contemplate how perfect the plan of redemption, and realize that we have not an high priest that cannot be touched by a feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, "yet without sin." In these days of so many Lo here's and Lo there's, we believe that the watchword for us, as a Society, is individual faithfulness to individual duty. Some one has said "it was individual faithfulness that gathered us as a Society, and that it is individual *un*faithfulness which is now scattering us to the world." To those who faithfully follow the guidance of the still small voice that speaks in the secret of every heart, will be revealed what there is for them to do. Sometimes what may appear very little things may be required, but by yielding obedience even to the least intimation of duty, there will be experienced a growth in grace, from, as it were, a little child "to the young man, then the strong man, to the pillar in the church that shall go no more out."—Ohio.

We mourn with you over the sufferings entailed on account of the late war: and though thankful that the sword is sheathed, yet it has left its mark on the nation by nourishing a feeling of pride in military glory; but we hail with joy the signs of a desire on the part of the warlike nations of Europe for an international court of appeal. May it please the All Wise ruler of events to hasten the time when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."—Iowa.

We hope, dear sisters, that there may be a renewed diligence on our part to live in union and communion with our Heavenly Father; that our foundations may be made sure on that immutable rock that will withstand all the trials, storms, and temptations of this life. And may our adorning be that of a meek and quiet spirit that leads to unspeakable peace and a willingness to endure the fiery baptisms that are permitted to come upon us for our purification.—Kansas.

Oh, what a loving Father we have to serve if we would only give up to trust Him entirely.—Kansas.

Why should we faint by the way when we have such an Almighty Helper, whose the work is?—Canada.

May you more firmly bind on the spiritual weapons while discarding the carnal, and your light shine so brightly that others may be led to follow in your footsteps, and thereby the day hasten when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.—Canada.

From Epistles to Canada Yearly Meeting.—We have in common with all lovers of peace been pained on account of that spirit which has so far prevailed in our land as to have resulted in actual war; and while there has been a living concern that we faithfully maintain our testimony against all war, deeper still has the concern prevailed that we labor to remove within ourselves the cause of war. So long as self rules in the hearts of men war is inevitable.

The testimony of George Fox and his coadjutors was that they were redeemed out of that spirit in which war has its origin and existence. This was not in word merely, but it was the testimony of their lives, to the extent that it commanded the attention and admiration of all with whom they came in contact, even their most violent enemies, and which found expression in the exclamation, "How those Quakers love one another." There can be no doubt that it was this redeemed character of the early Friend, the power and influence of this love of the brethren which extended to all men, actuating them to do good unto all and especially to those of the household of faith, which drew the people as doves to the windows, and which made them in that day, as "a city sought out and not forsaken." And is it not, dear Friends, the lack of this love which has brought us as a people to the low and stripped condition into which we confess we have fallen? The message to the church at Ephesus seems peculiarly applicable to us: "Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. Remember therefore, from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do thy first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and remove thy candlestick out of its place, except thou repent."—Iowa.

How much stronger we might have been had we more entirely surrendered ourselves into the care and keeping of this Mighty One who can cause one faithful "one to chase a thousand, and two, to put ten thousand to flight," if they are the enemies of Truth.—New England.

The present condition of the Christian church and the world call loudly for greater faithfulness on the part of the little remnants of Friends wherever situated—even to be so far separated from the spirit of the world that we can put on the whole armor of God, and go forth in His name, which is His power.—New England.

We are renewedly impressed with the sincerity and all-satisfying nature of experimental religion, and the restful, refreshing intercourse of its happy possessors.—Western.

Moses' law commands that "the man that shall be unclean, and shall not purify himself, that soul shall be cut off from among the congregation, because he hath defiled the sanctuary of the Lord" (Num. xix : 20). Does not this typify the necessity of yielding ourselves to the cleansing, sanctifying power and operation of God's Holy Spirit in our heart, whereby all things which do not minister to our spiritual life are taken away.—Western.

To Womens' Yearly Meeting, Canada.—His servants have at times been clothed with mourning on account of the luke-warmness and unwillingness of some to speak a word in season. "There is that withholdeth more than is meet but it tendeth to poverty," weakens our own hands and robs us of the blessing which is the reward for faithfully doing the little or much as it is called for, and which is due unto Him who is "Head over all things to the Church."—Canada Minute.

The story of the Gleaner, who, presenting as her own the single head of wheat, after having toiled all day in aiding others to do their work, laid it down discouraged at the Master's feet, was revived in our hearing. How loving and how beautiful his reply.

> "Child, it is enough, he answered;
> All I ask for, thou hast brought,
> And amid the band of reapers
> Truly bravely hast thou wrought."

So we, if only faithful in handing the cup of cold water, if done in the Saviour's name, shall not lose our reward.—To Absent Members.

We have been dipped into near sympathy with you, feeling that we have little to encourage us as to the outward, but we have been tenderly admonished to heed the witness in our every heart, and to seek for a settlement of mind, whereby we may the more readily hear and discern the voice of him who teacheth as never man taught.—New England.

This is a day of great outward activity, but we fear that there is not enough of that patient waiting and indwelling of spirit by which alone we may be fitted to labor availingly in the Lord's vineyard.—Ohio.

Franklin's Moral Wisdom.

On the assumption that his marriage became established in the course of years as a justifiable fact, Franklin's morality from this time forward to the close of his life appears to have been of a high order. He set before himself a lofty ideal, and made perpetual, and largely successful, efforts to reach it. Few professing Christians even have taken more trouble to become faultless, or have attained habits of life freer from apparent defects.

For this purpose he made out a list of moral virtues, and, while striving always to practice every one, selected each in turn successively for special cultivation week by week, so as to get good habits of action firmly fixed. And, in order that he might not be deceived in regard to the matter, he began the custom of daily self-examination, combined with prayer to "Powerful Goodness" for help in his arduous undertaking.

His list of virtues, with their precepts, were:

1. Temperance.—Eat not to dulness; drink not to elevation.

2. Silence.—Speak not but what may ben others or yourself; avoid trifling conversati

3. Order.—Let all your things have th places; let each part of your business have time.

4. Resolution.—Resolve to perform what y ought; perform without fail what you resol

5. Frugality.—Make no expense but to good to others, or to yourself; that is, wa nothing.

6. Industry.—Lose no time; be always e ployed in something useful; cut off all unnec sary actions.

7. Sincerity.—Use no hurtful deceit; thi innocently and justly; and, if you speak, spe accordingly.

8. Justice.—Wrong none by doing injuri or omitting the benefits that are your duty.

9. Moderation.—Avoid extremes, forb resenting injuries so much as you think t deserve.

10. Cleanliness.—Tolerate no uncleanlin in body, clothes, or habitation.

11. Tranquillity.—Be not disturbed at trif or at accidents common or unavoidable.

12. Chastity.

13. Humility.—Imitate Jesus and Socrat

Franklin's success in exhibiting these virt did not by any means reach his expectations, he was conscious of self-improvement. "Ord more than anything else baffled his effor
But "on the whole," he says, "though I ne arrived at the perfection I had been so am tious of obtaining, but fell far short of it,
I was, by the endeavor, a better and a happ man than I otherwise should have been, i had not attempted it," while he adds, "It n be well my posterity should be informed, t to this little artifice, with the blessing of G their ancestor owed the constant felicity of life, down to his seventy-ninth year, in wh this is written."

With such an example of honest effort remarkable attainment before us, how can speak slightingly, or sneeringly, or harshly, the plan which Franklin adopted, or the g which he reached? Would that thousands other men, men who have cursed this wo had followed the same course! Better fa have a Socrates than a Nero. Would t thousands of Christians, who have been c tent with less attainments in holiness, had ta half the pains to show forth works of fa and labors of love! This world would t have become a comparative paradise.

But notice how many of the great comma ments Franklin's list leaves out. Nothing said except by implication of the first six the eight, or the tenth. Nothing is said Christ's new commandment, or the law of fa or the law of self-sacrifice. Even genero and benevolence, of which our sage gives noble example, are not mentioned among objects at which he aimed.

And, connected with this, notice again many virtues on his list of excellencies bel to the class of minor morals. Some of th are mere matters of prudence—wise reg tions, indeed, necessary to respectability worldly success, but characteristics which we little in the scales of heaven compared those great duties whose omission from is wicked and abominable. Perhaps Fran thought it unnecessary to mention the weigh matters of the law, expecting to perform t how, and feeling no temptation to avoid

n. Whatever the reason of their absence, lack of mention is marked.
otice again how little stress apparently is on depth and purity of motive in the scheme h Franklin adopted. Affections of the t are not, indeed, entirely ignored. "Re-tion," "Sincerity," and "Humility," are es-ially virtues of the soul. But in speaking hem, particularly of the last, Franklin does seem to be much distressed by the absence hat inward emotion, which constitutes the f part of this grace, if only the outward earance can be kept up. He fails to see full value of a new heart and a right spirit.
morality is more external than internal.
ut the chief defect in Franklin's morality e absence of Christian motive and spiritual
e. His arguments are drawn chiefly from hly utility. Is the virtue he inculcates for himself and his fellow men? Does it people to keep well, to accumulate pro-y, to maintain a tranquil soul, to enjoy the forts of life? These are the questions which onsiders important and which determine worth of what he aims at and inculcates, little help apparently is to be derived from ine source in reaching his ideal. True, eaks of the excellence of his scheme "un-he blessing of God;" but it is the God of re and providence rather than the God of ition to whom he refers. His morality is ral morality, not Divine morality. It con-of virtues, not graces. Nor is Christ's ection with his system of any great value.
n example the Saviour is put on a level the Athenian Sage, and as, an inworking r through the operation of his Holy Spirit denied a place altogether. Some of the ves which terminate on Christ, or the inces which flow from Christ—none of those ring forces which uplift the believer, give haracter life as well as form, and make a perennial fountain of good—are ad-ed into the working of his moral machinery.
s not moved by love for the Saviour, or itude to Him, or the desire to honor Him, sense of dependence upon Him. His plan eistical, not Christian.—Robert Stewart in Christian Instructor.

A Fool's Folly.

When Robert Roberts died, he left a will bequeathing all his real estate to his children. Large sums of money were given to various benevolent objects, but to his nephew and namesake he left the old family Bible. "I do hereby will and bequeath to my beloved nephew and namesake my Bible, which has been my guide and comfort through my earthly pilgrimage, and which contains riches, both for this life and that which is to come. Search its pages diligently that you may have wisdom given you to know how to use the wealth of this world for your own comfort and pleasures, and for the glory of God; and I pray that you may find therein the Pearl of great price, which is of far greater value than all the wealth of earth, and which cannot be taken from you." Thus read the will.

When Robert Roberts, Jr., heard the will and received the Bible, his anger and indignation were such that he was about to cast it to the ground and stamp it with his foot, but his wife interposed, saying: "Let us take it home Robert, and if we do not care to read it, we can hide it away and forget the miserly old man who had nothing but an old Bible to give his be oved nephew."

Acting upon this suggestion, the precious book was taken home and placed in a pine box with this inscription: "A Fool's Folly." This was then placed in an old trunk in the attic and locked up and the key was thrown away. Here it lay forgotten for twenty-five long years. Children came to the home, but they were never told the story of the neglected Bible which lay locked in the old trunk in the attic. Sickness and sorrow entered this home. Then came long struggles with business matters, bringing discouragement and bankruptcy, and finally dissipation and death. The mother, enfeebled in health and broken in spirit, soon followed her husband to the grave, leaving three lovely daughters alone and friendless in the world.

The home had to be disposed of, and, in the midst of the preparations for the removal of the family, the old trunk in the attic was discovered. It was found securely locked, and when Edith was asked about it she could give no information. As no key could be found, the lock was broken open, and the box was discovered within, marked "A Fool's Folly." This was also opened, and to their surprise contained only an old leather-bound Bible with large brass clasps. Mould had gathered on the cover and the clasps were green with corrode. On opening it a letter was found directed to their father written thirty years before. With eager haste they read this letter, which was as follows:

"My Dear Brother—When you open this book to learn from its pages the way of life—which I pray you may soon do—you will find in addition to its sacred teaching a snug little fortune of fifty thousand dollars. If you neglect to search for the greater blessing you will lose the lesser, which will matter little if the first is lost. Your loving uncle,

ROBERT ROBERTS."

"Godliness contains the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Yet there are thousands at the present day repeating the "Fool's Folly." The Bible is to them a sealed book. If they were assured that in every Bible they opened they would find a fortune for this life, there would be a great searching of Bibles, yet they are willing to sell their souls for the wealth that will perish with the using.—Christian Press.

For "THE FRIEND."

From Letters of Joseph S. Elkinton.

We arrived at Jacob Wurtz about seventeen miles from Yorkton at noon, and were treated with hospitality; from thence onward until about six o'clock, when near a stream of water we halted, and started up a little camp fire to prepare supper, also a fire called a smudge to smoke off the mosquitoes that the horses might have some peace while feeding, as also ourselves, for the insects were very numerous and venomous.

We were about ten miles from our proposed lodging place. After supper we proceeded on our way for a mile or two when we saw a smudge fire, and a house similar to what we had seen in the South Colony settlement, and the question arose that in case we could be housed there, whether it would not be better for us and our horses to stop over night; there was quite a chasm to cross before reaching the house, but the horses did well, and we had a good greeting from a family of about thirty, having a hand shaking with all of them, and it appeared to be a delight to them to meet with our guide Ivan Nicholi Kazahou a (Turpienski Dukhobor) for they all kissed him. I had supposed that he had been selected by Prince Hilkoff as one who had the affections of the people: although it is not likely he knew of that family having taken up land there.

There was another building going up that had four compartments, and a cellar under one of them, that gave a fair prospect of the family being divided. A yoke of oxen and a cow was to be seen, and a plough and shed, also a bake-oven, and near by the river Assiniboia, a bath house.

We were assured of a good start the next morning, which we had with a feeling farewell; genuine kindness had been shown us, and I do not remember feeling more thankful than I did for the shelter given at this time. Crossing a slough, our guide to lighten the load undertook to walk a log, but slipped and went in over boot top, and for a time was in considerable discomfort, but it ranked with other difficulties that were overcome. We crossed the Assiniboia River on a scow, attached by two loops that were to be slipped along a rope that was run through them and stretched across the river; both the loops and ropes seemed a good deal chafed, but they held. On the bank was an Indian camp of what might be called real aborigines, in their rough and picturesque dress. They had probably been trading their skins at the fort, which being a trading post, considerable business is still done in skins that are shipped to England; one very rare skin the storekeeper told me was sold in London for one hundred and thirty-five pounds. The storekeeper was interested in conversing about the Dukhobors hoping to do business with them, and was desirous that they would turn their attention to raising cattle, and not be too anxious about wheat, which he said could be bought anytime. He spoke of his own success raising horses and cattle, and there was quite a number in his smoke yard appreciating the relief from the mosquitoes. We made this our feeding place, and then proceeded on our journey, fifteen miles of which, was a very bad road, the ground being very sloughy. It was said this was the wettest season for seventeen years. The next ten miles was better travelling, still it was pretty heavy draught over the prairie, especially so when we lost our trail, and with no little difficulty through thickets and swamps, we regained our tracks, and with a desperate rough hill to descend came to a crossing on Swan River where there was no scow, only rafts which seemed very flimsy for such a strong current; William Bellows and I were on one and the baggage on another, I hardly supposed the driver would attempt fording, but he did with our guide, and a rattling time they had of it over the stones. The bottom of the wagon was very wet and muddy by the time it got up on the bank; after loading up again, went on a mile or two and arrived at the North Colony, and were kindly received. As rain seemed to threaten we made no stop after leaving Fort Pelly, and it was a great relief to get under the tent of Sacher Satz the Russian nurse who had quite a dispensary. She, with a orphan girl, prepared our meal, our own provisions being produced; this was continued during our stay. In the evening we were waited on by a delegation of business men with whom we had interesting conversation, there being a Government interpreter there that had a tent near by. When through with the interview they said they would show us to our room, and took us to one of the government buildings where we were nicely accommodated.

There are twenty-five or thirty of these buildings that have been put up in a workman-like manner near the river bank, the location being probably chosen because of the access to the water, and timber being near at hand. A good many families have gone out from this colony to their farms, and yet the colony is still a large one. In the interview last evening we were told that not nearly all their baggage had reached them, which is a hardship, and yet in keeping with the problem of settling people by thousands who have but little means and no conveyances of their own, at a distance of from thirty to one hundred miles from a railroad station, and we might almost say with roads to make through the prairies.

The work goes on slowly, but we see the evidences of advancing civilization as the people have opportunity, building, blacksmithing, carpentering, cooperage; and a number of wagons have been built. I saw before breakfast six women stepping off lively with a pair of low wheels, and not long after, the same women had a long log on it with a chain attached to the log, and it was remarkable how briskly they walked off towards a new building that was going on, as if it was no hardship.

Criticisms have been made to the import that the women do an undue share of the work, and it may be so, but having seen such enormous budgets on the backs of men, and their quickness to do friendly acts, and the skill with which tools were handled by those happy enough to have them, together with the testimonies of their employers, I feel there should be moderation of censure when so near everything is done by people of so little means.

I saw ten little boys and girls with a truck on low wheels pulling three sacks of flour from the store-room to the cabins over quite a hilly pathway, that it looked as if they were taught to be useful.

I asked the agent at Yorkton if he ever knew of the Dukhobors refusing employment of not more than twenty per cent. short of what others had received who could speak English, and he said, "No."

The mosquitoes being so very annoying it was not thought expedient to attempt a meeting on the open field, so I visited in the separate buildings. The interpreter becoming deeply interested was a great aid in the matter. Two funerals were also attended in the two days spent among them, which were solemn occasions; these were conducted in oriental style, four men carrying the corpse, the coffin resting on ropes attached to poles. There was some drapery on the coffin that was removed before it was lowered into the grave; some singing at the grave-side, when the immediate relatives and others withdrawing to more open ground, had devotional exercises very similar to that practised at sunrise on First-day meetings. Ten men and as many women facing each other, and after repeating a psalm or hymn in concert, there would be exhortation from men and women. A woman at one of the funerals, I was told by the interpreter had been speaking from the fifth chapter of Matthew and enlarging on the passage, "Blessed are they that mourn;" without knowing the interpretation of what she offered I followed her, stating that one of the prophetic declarations of the Saviour was that He should comfort those that mourn, and when He was personally on earth, He said that He would pray the Father to send them another Comforter. The grave yard was in a well selected spot, in which there were eight graves, and some of them quite high mounds similar to those we see pictures of in the east.

On the evening of the twenty-fourth, Dr. Mercer arrived from the South Colony; his team was a light one, and he did not risk driving them through the river, but left his wagon on the far side, and let the horses take to swimming if they could not wade, they however got over, and he came on the raft; he took lodgings in our apartment.

On First-day morning, Sixth Month 25th, devotional exercises were engaged in, in the store-room, which was more suitable than out of doors. I was very much impressed with the sober look and tearful eye that was to be seen, probably induced by the recent deaths. I felt that the offering that morning was owned by Him who knoweth the language of every heart, and the fulness of the sentences of what is called the Lord's prayer never came to me more livingly than upon this occasion.

In the evening of the same day there were about as many gathered into the storeroom as could stand, possibly two hundred, (it being designed as a farewell opportunity) after what I had to offer in a religious way, the meeting was left open for what any of those assembled might have to communicate. There was some thrilling accounts told of the experiences in Russia, and the strong desires for Friends to continue their efforts for the release of those still in exile, and expressions of gratitude for what had been done for them. Two boys who stood immediately in front of me had their testimony to offer, and I thought they had h from on high.

Visiting from house to house brought to knowledge some very afflictive circumstan of bereavements. One mother had lost daughter about twenty years of age some weeks before. The raft she was crossing river on was overloaded and all on it plung into the river, those who were able swam ashor two were rescued with great difficulty, and was carried down stream and never seen aft wards. The mother handed me an article th belonged to her daughter that she wished to accept as a present. It was also touchi to be asked to take a meal with a mother th I had met with in the St. John's Hospital w had parted with a daughter there.

Ivan Ivins who was one of the six that ca over first to prospect the country, has a ho building on the plain a little back of the riv that would indicate he expected to settle the his wife seems like a woman of fine feelin and a niece of one of the most prominent the Dukhobortsi in Russia. She speaks E lish as also two of her children; she wo have a meal set for William Bellows and self.

On the leave taking early on the twenty-six one who was spokeswoman for other wor that wished to see me off, said her father three thousand sheep, fifty horses and wagons taken from him in Russia; she seer like a woman of character.

William Bellows wishing to have more of company of Dr. Mercer whom he knew in E land remained, and I left, expecting to din Fort Pelly. The team was driven across river as before, and I crossed on the raft, f ing there was much cause for gratitude fo safe passage, as for escapes from other pe I had met with. Ivan, our faithful guide h with the driver and myself, and was very ful helping to find the trail, and showing wh to make new ones, for it was an easy thing get off the trail. We reached Fort Pelly at 2.30 P. M. and staid until 4 P. M. in which t we not only had dinner, but had a nice in view with W. McKinzie the storekeeper, had a look into the eight Indian tents, the mates of which looked like the children of ture indeed.

The horses did not seem to enjoy the pass on the scow across the Assiniboia River, with the rearing and plunging they enga in before rushing up the steep bank I was ra surprised the wagon held together. We the bad slough to go through which put horses to the utmost of their strength to out, but our pilot this time succeeded in w ing the log.

The Dukhobor Immigration.

To the Editor of the Manitoba Free Pres

Permit me to correct an error containe your article on the Dukhobors in this morni issue. The money which I am spending in chasing stock for these people was contrib by the Friends (Quakers), of Philadelphia, I was asked by them to come up here an the work, which I cheerfully agreed to spending my own time and money.

Permit me to say that your departme immigration in this city deserves the hig praise for the work they are doing in co with the settlement of the Dukhobors. Mr. Creary and his able assistants seem to be ring in their efforts, devoting not only the l office hours, but nights and Sundays to needs of the immigrants. Very respect-y, PETER JANSEN, Jansen, Neb.

They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength (Is. xl: 31).

Lord, what a change within us one short hour
Spent in thy presence will prevail to make!
What heavy burdens from our bosoms take!
What parched grounds refresh as with a shower!
We kneel—and all around us seems to lower.
We rise—and all the distant and the near Stand forth in sunny outline brave and clear.
We kneel—how weak; we rise—how full of power.

Why, therefore, should we do ourselves this wrong;
Or others—that we are not always strong;
That we are ever overborne with care;
That we should ever weak or heartless be,
Anxious or troubled, while with us is prayer,
And joy, and strength, and courage are with Thee?

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Notes Concerning the Jews.

In the last number of the Jewish Era, a Christian quarterly published "in behalf of Israel," I find a number of items relative to the Jews in various parts of the world, which will claim the interested attention of all who feel a concern for the welfare of the scattered nation.

A minister who has given a good deal of time to distributing (in European countries), copies of the New Testament to the Jews, says that in some places which he visited, the people entreated him upon their knees to give them copies. He also stated that a body of thirteen Jews, at Hamburg, met weekly for prayer, to be enabled to discover through the study of the Hebrew New Testament, whether Jesus of Nazareth be indeed the Christ.

"Certain gentlemen who were traveling between Amsterdam and Utrecht happened to meet with several Jews. In the course of their conversation a remark was made by one of the travelers about the weather being so unfavorable for gathering in the harvest, for the rain had been falling during many days, and they feared that the country would be flooded. One of the Jews said it was a slight judgment upon the Christians for their disrespect of Jesus the Messiah, the Saviour of the world. 'And what do you care about Jesus?' said one of the gentlemen. 'Are not you Jews?' 'Yes,' replied the other, 'it is true, we are Jews, but we believe as firmly in Christ as most Christians do. We have long been separated from the synagogue, and meet by ourselves to read the New Testament and pray to Jesus Christ. Our members are very numerous in Amsterdam.' 'But why,' asked the gentleman, 'do you not come forward and join the church openly and at once?' 'Because,' answered the Jew, 'your practice and profession are so different that we think we are better by ourselves. You act as if you did not believe in what you profess. The laws of Jesus of Nazareth are, or seem to be, of no value in your eyes, or in the estimation of many of your people. Surely, if there were nothing else to prevent us from believing that Christianity is true, the wickedness we see among you would be enough. But we turn to God. We read His word, and we believe and are sure that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God.'"

It is stated that there is perhaps no country in the world, at the present day, where such a lively interest is taken in the Jew, as there is in Norway, although in Norway itself there are scarcely any Jews. This exceptional interest, it appears, originated about fifty years ago through the prayerful concern of a certain Ragerhild Haerm. One day she remonstrated with the pastor of the place where she lived, because, though he always prayed for the heathen, he never included "poor scattered Israel" in his soul's supplications. "The Jews!" he replied, rather hotly, "We have nothing to do with them. They have been cast off, and now it is the time of the Gentiles." Her effort to reason with him then was of no avail, but, subsequently, the opportunity was afforded to speak convincingly to him of the claim of the despised and often persecuted Jew to the sympathy and spiritual help of all Gentiles claiming to be Christians.

Some account is given of the late Joseph Rabinowitz, who died on Fifth Month 17th last, of malaria, at the Convalescent Hospital in Odessa, Russia. Born in 1837, at the early age of six years he could repeat the whole of the "Song of Songs," and at eight, astonished the assembly at the Feast of Tabernacles, by repeating long passages from the Talmud. He early showed a remarkable proficiency in the acquisition of languages. "I took no pleasure," are his words, "in the amusements and occupations of my youthful companions, but was entirely absorbed in Chasidic devotions and meditations on the eternal." The days of his years were spent as a shopkeeper, a journalist (in St. Petersburg), and as a lawyer, until, in the providence of God, having gone to Palestine in the interest of a colonization society of his country, that his people might escape the cruel enforcement of the so-called "May Laws" of 1882, he was there the subject of a remarkable Divine visitation, and was thence enabled publicly to declare that he had "found Him of whom Moses and the prophets did write." Then ensued what was called the "South Russia Movement," and a meeting house was built called Somerville Hall, upon which was placed the inscription, "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." Many thousands of copies of the New Testament Rabinowitz placed in the hands of the Jews, and his latest labor was a translation, not completed, of the Yiddish New Testament.

The many interested in the outcome of the re-trial of Dreyfus, the Jewish officer, and alleged traitor, will find deeply suggestive the statement that "in London, on March 1st, the leading Israelites of Europe met. There were about a dozen in all, but they could control nearly a thousand millions of dollars, or nearly all the ready cash in France, in twenty-four hours. At this conference the future means necessary to secure the release and honorable reinstatement of Dreyfus in the French army were discussed."

The "Zionist movement" for the Jewish rehabilitation of Palestine (the third Congress in advocacy of which is about convening as this is written), is very variously estimated by the Jews themselves. The remark of a speaker at a Socialistic meeting of Jewish workingmen in Russian Poland is given. Averring that "Zionism is not worthy to be supported by Jewish workingmen, because no sooner will the Jews have taken possession of the land, than there will be the same subjugation of the workingman by the Jewish capitalists, and long working hours as in the Christian countries," a Jewish worker, interrupting, exclaimed, "I would rather work a couple of hours longer daily, for less money, knowing I live in my own home and country, than to be a stranger in a strange land." Writing from Alexandria, Egypt, a correspondent of the Jewish Era, evidently greatly burdened in mind, says: "I do not like to sympathize with the Zionists' movement, without God and without prayer," because there are many among the conservative or orthodox Jews who decline to unite with the project under the belief that its inception has a material rather than a God-serving foundation. Many in this country are flatly opposed to the project, being entirely content to continue all their days in the land of their adoption.

The geologist, Dr. Schlichter, claims that the old country Manomatapa, a portion of the lately erected British province of Rhodesia, in lower Africa, can be no other than the Scriptural Land of Ophir from which King Hiram of Phœnicia brought his treasures of gold and ebony. In the district of Mganga, old remains were found in surprising numbers, "hundreds of old fortresses, grandly built water works and many smelting ovens, with great heaps of quartz," as well as traces of the gold mines! As it is further stated that this kingdom of Manomatapa is to be made an object of further investigation by Dr. Carl Peters, the eminent explorer and antiquarian, we may yet look for some more specific and reliable data.

The following singular incident of current happening, going to show the standing of an old Mosaic requirement in a modern court of law, is quoted from Die Welt:

"Before the grand jury in Jekaterinoslaw in Russia, there is going on a remarkable trial, that has caused a sensation all over the empire. Our readers know from the Bible that the law commanded the brother of a childless, deceased Israelite to marry his widow, and if he refused to marry her, she drew off his shoe and spat in his face (Deut. xxv: 5, 9). Now, in the above-mention Russian city, a man by the name of Mordechai Postnik, died and left a widow without children. His brother, Reuben Postnik, cannot marry her without committing bigamy, but he refuses also to undergo the ceremony prescribed by the law, thus preventing her from marrying again. So she sued him one hundred rubles for damages for each month since the death of her husband, the whole amounting to twelve hundred rubles. The jury dismissed the defendant, whereupon the widow appealed to the higher court, alleging that the Russian law recognizes the binding force of the Jewish law over Jews in all matters pertaining to marriages and divorces. The higher court accepted the appeal of the widow and will hear Jewish rabbis as experts on this question, and if they affirm the allegation of the widow, her brother-in-law will have to pay her one hundred rubles alimony monthly, beginning with the death of her husband, until he undergoes the ceremonies described by the law, so that she can marry again."

It is easy to live in the world after the world's opinion. It is easy to live in solitude after our own. But the great man is he who, in the midst of the crowd, keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of character.—Emerson.

For "The Friend."

Our Mission.

I would not have any of the many readers of The Friend, who feel bound to the support of our profession in its ancient purity and simplicity, however isolated their situation or discouraging their surroundings may be, to conclude that the mission of our beloved religious Society is ended, not even in any of the least or seemingly unimportant characteristics of its earlier and brighter day, as many under our name throughout our borders have, from their attitude towards many of them, seemed to conclude. For if we fully believe, as the writer is constrained to do, that those precious doctrines and testimonies inscribed upon our banner by the finger of God, and given in charge to those worthy sons and daughters of the morning of our day to bear aloft before the world, are the Truth and its accompaniments as it is in Jesus, and which being received in the heart through the operation and baptism of the Holy Spirit, constitute such royal subjects of the kingdom of Christ upon earth, and that these only in their virtue and essence are adequate thereto, then we shall no doubt be prepared to see on looking abroad something of what there is yet to be accomplished ere we may reasonably hope through their leavening influence for the legitimate end of their service, the fulfilment of that ancient prophecy, that "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea" and "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

As an encouragement it may be noted that not a little fruit has been plucked from some of the branches of this goodly tree by the universal brotherhood of man here and there and pronounced good, leaving unmistakably an impress. But how much more our influence for good as a distinct people would have been had we been more faithful to the charge originally committed to us in its entirety, we cannot accurately know; but it is but reasonable to suppose it would have been much greater than it evidently has been; which consideration should be sufficient to incite us to ponder well in all things the ways of our feet. And now from this standpoint of observation, what a mournful aspect the present condition of the Society as a whole presents, and all brought about from forsaking Him who has ever so conspicuously preserved His people, as they have implicitly followed and trusted in Him.

The cause of our being subjected to the great scourge of infidelity that was permitted to overtake us, which culminated in the mournful disruption of most of the meetings on this continent about seventy years ago, found way perhaps through a state of lethargy, "a dwelling too securely in our own ceiled houses" not being found sufficiently on the "watch tower" timely to discern this insidious approach of the enemy, until he had gained such a foothold as to produce through his active agents the sad consequences that followed.

And as to that defection tending to an opposite extreme in doctrine so soon on the eve of this making its appearance, it seems likely ultimately to prove more disastrous and far-reaching in its tendency to lay waste our goodly heritage than the former, in that it is more enticing and captivating to the unregenerate, holding out the tempting bait to make them good Christians without the mortificatio the cross, substituting an outward literal f for the one which is inward and spiritual, which only is sufficient to enable any to o come the evil one in themselves, and in world. This defection manifests that it wide departure from our root-doctrine of Lord's light and leadership, which was so spicuous a characteristic of our better day, which is not only befitting, but absolutely sential for all such to experience as w keep their integrity to our profession in purity and simplicity. That the influe springing from this unsavory root are sti leaven at work, even in the more conserva branches of our Society, (wherein seems to side the hope of its perpetuation), is evid from, I fear, the increasing tendency to ro of those testimonies which have ever serve mark us a peculiar and world-renouncing ple. If we go back to the beginning of heresy we will see that this was very early tendency, so that in a comparatively brief sp of time the largest and hitherto most influe Yearly Meeting* we find practically igno them, thus as it were putting its light und bushel in respect to witnessing against evils and excesses they are intended to ren or rectify. And now shall we, the conserva bodies, who have renounced fellowship with and its assimilative branches, be found gr ally slackening our hand in respect to a f ful support of the entire charge committe us, as ere long to be forced to realize tha are no longer entitled to be recognize plants of this "goodly vine," but degene plants of the "strange vine" unto the L and thus be in danger of our "candlestic ing removed," as having deserted our ch so that there is no longer place found for

Although I have felt thus to write, it be as a warning to more entire dedication faithfulness to our trust; I have a comf ble hope that through a rallying to the served support of the ancient standard we be preserved therefrom. For short of this shall we hope for preservation from the and degeneracy that have attended such u our name as have departed from it?

It seems with me now to refer brief threatening tendencies operating, I appre in some places even where conservative seems in a good degree dominant. For is not a tendency towards creaturely aggra ment in the way of refined social culture high intellectual and literary attainments, too much of a dependence thereon? Oh will this where operative exclude its vo from coming effectually to the "child's s the teachable state, out of which none c availingly taught by Him who still teac never man taught. For He will not gi glory to another, nor delegate to man hi rogatives, however cultured or refined h be. No climbing up some other way, or ing in but by Him the door, is availing, fo such as thus enter can experience a go and out, and finding pasture such as will n up the soul unto everlasting life. s of its brighter day—nonconformity to world, embracing in the fullest extents of scope many of our distinguishing testies. Many of which have been sacrificed by compromise their efficiency destroyed ugh the influence of this deified Moloch of turely attainment usurping supremacy (it be feared), over the prerogative of God, right, through the immediate manifestaof his Spirit, wisdom and power, of the rol and direction in all the affairs of his tant church. Now I apprehend it is needhere to enumerate these testimonies, for ill be readily understood by the intelligent er that they are such as tend to separate n the world, or render their devotees sinr or peculiar in its eyes, or in other words ubject them to the necessity of bearing the cross, from which these modern aspirants higher plane seem to be relieved, notwithding the way to true discipleship still reis to be by it, for it is now as applicable hen first uttered by our Saviour himself, homsoever shall deny me before men, him I also deny before my Father which is in en." Notwithstanding such may claim to prophesied in his name, and in his name many wonderful works, the language will pplicable, "Depart from me all ye workers quity," "I never knew you." For they being as rejected the "child's state," wherein He is availingly known, and instruction re- to walk in all the ways of his commands, are unavoidably left to grope their way rkness.

w if the evils and excesses abounding in orld, which these peculiarities of our pron were originally intended (I have no e), to remove or rectify, still exist, how ve consistently claim a release from their rt? For is not such an abandonment of a tacit admission that they were never ly required, thus practically ignoring the nony to their importance, made by the conspicuously faithful and prominently l members of our religious Society from ginning to the present time, who have antly and all along manifested by example recept their firm allegiance to them. Such se coming in by convincement when under dministration of that day of faithfulness le things, have without exception found heir peace of mind and further advance d the meridian day consisted in yielding ir adoption.

Friends, instead of these our testimonies the first to be given up, is it not most that the faithful will be bound to their rt, perhaps long after our fundamental nes will have been universally accepted? r the very reason that the evils they are ed to remove not being so marked or nole though evils, it is but reasonable to de they will be the last to be recognized laggard world in its advance toward the ium day. Is there not a danger in this outward ease and freedom from perseon account of our profession, a day n the world, and the counsels of nations is an evident acknowledgment of the corss of our doctrines in some important lars, that we in the vanity of our minds account may be diverted from keeping e single to the good Master? If our eye le, we shall be preserved in the pathway appointed for our feet to walk in, even in the footsteps of the flock of Christ's companions who have gone before, bearing aloft the same banner they bore unsullied and untarnished by the hand of time. For thus only can we witness that we are their successors indeed, and worthy of the honored appellation of Friend.

For "The Friend."

Truly Called.

"God is a spirit and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in Truth" (John iv: 24). Now it is evident that the qualification of the Spirit comes directly from God. It is through His own quickening power alone that man has any ability to render any acceptable service to the salvation of souls. Some seem to think that if they are willing to work in the gospel vineyard, the willingness constitutes the Spirit, but if they could only see by the search light of the Holy Ghost the vanities which lie hidden in the human mind, they might discover selfish and vainglorious reasons for such external service. Can an unholy person be called of God to preach the holy doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ? Is it any guarantee of their being called, because they are apt at Scripture quotations?

Satan presumed to quote Scripture to the Son of God to persuade Him, in order to overthrow the eternal plan of redemption for the restoration of fallen man. He presented himself before the Lord for service (Job ii). He is as eager as ever, and wants no better confederates than people eager for position and renown.

Our own minds must be perfectly subdued by the will of God, humbled, and passively waiting to know his bidding. He alone can authorize and qualify to preach the unsearchable riches of the Gospel. There would be fewer professing to be called if persecutions were as rife as in the days of the primitive Gospel ministry; and some of those most persistent in the claims of this professed calling would be the last to seek it in the face of danger. Sinners would not be so slow to discern the beauty and power of gospel grace, if all waited to hear God's memorial unto all generations.

If they were as particular to know the source of the call, they might hear: "God hath sent thee," or "I Am hath sent thee" (Ex. iii: 14, 15). God hath given a sure test of what the call should be, and it is to all generations. Very few wait to hear it now. There is no place on record where Satan was permitted to call himself by the Almighty name.

Nor do I believe any should dare to take upon themselves publicly to teach or preach the word, short of this test-proof of their calling.

Items Concerning the Society.

Benjamin Vail has obtained a minute from the Northern District Monthly Meeting to attend Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting and the meetings composing it, and to visit some families and individuals.

"We are told," says the North Carolina Friend, "that those who are called missionaries in England are practically the same as pastors in America, the difference being chiefly in terms."

In the North Carolina Friend's report of the recent Yearly Meeting at High Point, occurs the following language: "James R. Jones gave a well directed talk on the need of preaching the gospel. Our Lord never said, 'Go hold silent meetings,' but He did say, 'Go preach the Gospel.' He said, 'we must feel the responsibility for the souls about us or else we are not a church of Christ. In England he had seen a brass band before a meeting house, and an organ, fiddle and horn in the gallery—not at regular meetings for worship, but at special meetings held to reach and save the perishing."

In the Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight (N. C.), David Sampson gave a brief review of the changes that have come to our meeting in the last twenty-five years, showing, as he believed, a great need of doctrinal teaching in our meetings. This need is the outgrowth of the many accessions through revival effort, and neglect in the proper instruction of our children.

This resulted in a recommendation to the Yearly Meeting "that the principles of Friends be more generally and systematically presented to our membership; especially the younger and newer members." And a committee was appointed to visit the different quarters and give such attention to the subject as the situation required.

We believe, as a matter of fact, that the commonly silent pauses before the meals of Friends, have exercised a very great influence upon successive generations who have observed this usage—an influence far greater than they have been aware of. Twenty or thirty pauses made by a family every week, ostensibly for remembering together the bounty of God, must exert an enormous influence in maintaining a sense of the nearness of the spiritual world, even though some formalism may often enter into the observance.—J. S. Rowntree.

Notes from Others.

It is still the fashion, at some of our Peace gatherings, to criticise the Christian Churches, as if they were wholly indifferent to the question of peace and war. This is unjust. We will admit frankly that the churches are not doing their duty; that any adequate conception of the authority of the Prince of Peace, and the meaning of the Divine method of the cross and the place of the gospel of peace in the message of the churches, would make them a peace society in such a sense that there would not be occasion, or even room, for any other. —Herald of Peace.

There is at the present time much activity in the Church. There is splendid organization, and seemingly a great deal of earnestness manifested in the work of Christ. This is all well enough, but still we must not be deceived. It may be only the noise of the shaking of the dry bones. Even if they all come together into perfect form, still nothing will result to the glory of God until the Spirit of God has given life. The altar that had no fire on it was a poor, worthless thing. So the organization, whatever its nature, and however perfect, is a useless thing until it is animated by God's Holy Spirit. —Christian Instructor.

In talking with a foreign missionary recently, he expressed an opinion adverse to schools for the secular education of the heathen. He referred to the fact that scarcely a single convert has been brought in through the college into the church. To educate unconverted heathen people only gives them more power for battling against Christ, as the cultivated intellect is stronger than the untrained. The scholarly Ingersoll had more influence than a hundred illiterate infidels.—Christian Instructor (Presbyterian.)

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

United States.—The reports received by the Treasurer of the United States show that up to date $33,476,350 of gold coin and bullion have been exchanged for gold certificates.

The auxiliarly cruiser Panther, with a cargo of supplies valued at $50,000, sailed for Porto Rico on Eighth Month 22nd. Lieutenant Commander Ward expected to turn over the supplies to Governor Davis at San Juan. She arrived at her destination on the 27th.

Ex-Representative McDowell, now Clerk of the House, in an interview in the Washington Star says: "Times are good in my State. There is not a man in my neighborhood, Sharon, who need be out of work if he is willing to work. Common labor is commanding about $1.50 a day, and skilled labor gets big wages. The fact of the matter is that the laboring man is on the top of the heap in my section, and is able to dictate terms to his employer. Every factory and mill is running full time. The merchants are doing a good business, the railroads are hauling vast quantities of freight, the farmers are prosperous and the whole community is at work. It may sound strange to say it, but it is a fact that the only people who are lagging behind the procession of prosperity are the bankers. They can't find a market for their money. Now, take our little town, of probably 10,000 inhabitants. I will assert that there is $1,300,000 idle money in that town to-day. The banks can't get borrowers. One reason for this is that the mills have gone into the trust, and are being run with the money put up by the trust. Formerly, it was the custom for every bank to carry the paper of the mills, sometimes as high as $250,000 to a bank. That market is now cut off. The most encouraging feature, I think, is the good price which common labor commands. When the day laborer, the unskilled workman, can get $1.50 for his work, it means that the community is prospering."

A New York despatch says: "The immense bank clearings, the enormous traffic and earnings of the railroads, the activity in trade, the unprecedented operations of the industries, especially iron and steel, the firmness of prices, the demands of consumers that reach out not only for supplies for the coming fall, but actually far into the coming year—these are the things which make up the record of the country's prosperity, but the facts are so well known that even the astounding statistics of expanding business, as they are published week by week, no longer excite wonder."

There are 1,170 paper and pulp mills in the United States, producing annually a million tens of paper and more than 600,000 tons of pulp.

In the South within the first five months $17,000,000 of new capital has been invested in cotton mills.

Missouri recently shipped forty carloads of live chickens to Hawaii. The Hawaiian Government has given consent to the importation of nearly 10,000 laberers from Japan during the next quarter.

The revenues of the Philippine Islands from the date of the American occupation to Seventh Month 31, amounted to $5,249,411.

The receipts of the Island of Cuba, from First Month 1st to Sixth Month 30, 1899, exceeded the expenditures by $1,480,021.

The law prohibiting the manufacture, sale or gift of cigarettes enacted at the recent session of the Florida Legislature has been declared unconstitutional by Circuit Judge Call, in Jacksonville.

The Public Ledger, says: "Electricity has made another step. By a recent discovery in Pittsburg it is now made to take the place of coal in melting glass sand, and does the work in scarcely mere seconds than the coal takes hours. The result will be almost a revolution in glass making, but it will have a depressing effect on the coal trade."

There were 406 deaths in this city last week, which is 25 mere than the previous week and 23 more than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 112 were children under one year of age; 216 were males and 190 females: 36 died of consumption; 33 of cholera infantum; 30 of marasmus; 22 of heart diseases; 22 of diphtheria; 21 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 18 from casualties; 16 of pneumonia; 15 of convulsions; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of old age; 11 of inanition; 10 of Bright's disease, and 9 of apoplexy.

Markets, &c. — U. S. 2's, 100¾ a 101; 4's, reg., 112¾ a 112¾; coupon, 112¾ a 113; new 4's, reg., 130 a 131; 5's, 111¼ a 112; 3's 108¼ a 108¾.

COTTON was in limited request, but ruled steady on a basis of 6⅞c. per pound for middling uplands.

HOGS.—Western, 4⅝ a 7¼c.

FOREIGN.—The London Statist says: "There will be very large exports of wheat to meet the demands of Western Europe. American farmers are disposing of their crops rapidly and at tolerably good prices, and they will be able to purchase from the East and Europe as fully as they have been doing this year. The United States has made great progress of late years in manufacturing and trading, but it is still an essentially agricultural country, and its prosperity depends mainly on the harvests. Therefore, fair wheat and good harvests of other productions means the continuance of the well-being of the farmers, who are the backbone and life blood of the country." The Statist then adds: "Under the circumstances, it is reasonably certain that railroad traffic returns and foreign orders for locomotives, steel, etc., will continue to increase."

Great Britain's merchandise imports during the first six months of 1899 were the largest of any corresponding period in its history. Its exports for the same period were the largest since 1891, and have never been exceeded, except in the opening half of that year and of 1892.

It is now only a matter of time when all the principal countries of Europe will be connected by telephone. Arrangements were completed a short time ago for the building of two separate lines between Berlin and Paris, and now it is understood steps have been taken for uniting the telephone systems of France and Italy, and for constructing telephone lines between Genoa, Nice, Turin and Lyons.

The island of Heligoland, scarcely three miles in circumference, rising abruptly 200 feet out of the sea, is visibly crumbling away and effacing itself in the waves more rapidly than any other place of equal size knewn to scientific observation.

At the Dreyfus Court Martial one expert admitted that he had formerly believed the borderean to be the work of Dreyfus, but discovered his orrer, and now believed it was written by Esterhazy.

A sanitary cerden has been established around Oporto during the continuance of the bubenic plague there.

Denmark claims that there is not a single person in her domain who cannet read and write.

Great military activity prevails in England, and troops, munitions of war are being hurried to Cape Colony. Interest in the Boer crisis is increased by a report in South Africa that France and Germany may participate in the Transvaal inquiry of Secretary Chamberlain. The Boers have large supplies of ammunition, and Germans in Johannesburg have notified President Kruger of their readiness to enlist in case war be declared.

The telegraph will be extended 1000 miles south of Khartoum by the end of the year.

There now remains only one people and one little valley south of the equator whose sovereignty has not been claimed by some European Power. It is the Valley of Barotse, fifty or sixty miles wide, north of Lialui, in South Africa. And the only reason why the Marotse, who inhabit it, have preserved their independence is that England and Portugal both claim it, and therefore the work of "civilization" is at a standstill.

The ravages caused by famine and smallpox en the east coast of Africa have become se appalling that it has been decided to appeal to the Lerd Mayer of London to open a Mansion House Fund for the relief of British subjects.

The State Department has received information from Colonel Charles Denby, President of the Philippine Commission, in regard to the opening of the public schools of the city of Manila. He encloses a circular, printed in English, Spanish and Tagalos, announcing that the schools were to be opened Seventh Month 3rd, for a scheol year of nine months. From this circular it appears that the study of the English language is compulsery. The schools are free, where under Spanish rule a small fee was charged. Regular attendence at some school of all children between the ages of six and twelve years is compulsory, and the police of each district are required to enforce attendence and report delinquents. It is provided that one hour's instruction per day shall be devoted to the English language.

An agreement has been reached between the American authorities in the Philippines and the Sultan of Sulu by which American sovereignty over the Mores is acknowledged. The subsidy paid the Sultan by Spain is to be continued by the United States.

Several of the new municipal geverments set up by the Americans in Luzen are reperted to have collapsed, because of the treachery of the Filipino Mayors. The trend of affairs tends to make the policy of leniency unpopular among the Americans. When they abandened Moreng they burned the whole town.

The correspendent of the Associated Press at Havana writes that there is a remarkable change coming over the Cuban people on the subject of annexation, and that the advocates of immediate independence are losing ground. Annexation is now openly urged by business and pr sional men, it is said.

A strip of territory claimed by Brazil and Peru, kn as the Acre Territory, has declared its independence.

In the course of a religious visit in Manitoba to Assiniboia, Eliza H. Varney has visited the settlements of the newly arrived Dukhobors in their North and South colonies during the 7th Month. In this part of her visit she was accompanied by Job S. Gidley of Northampton, Mass. They spent fifteen days among them, travelling about five hundred miles by private conveyance, and had religious opportunities with the people of thirty-eight different villages; and also visited a number of the sick and afflicted, speaking mostly through an interpreter who accompanied them. Much openness was shown in receiving the labors of these Friends by these poor people, who in the midst of their privations, maintain a cheerfulness, and trust in Divine Providence and love for each other that are very remarkable. Our minds were kindly assisted also by the Government officials. E. H. Varney afterwards proceeded to Winnipeg expecting to meet in the prosecution of her journey with scattered members of Canada Yearly Meeting residing in different localities in the N. W. Territory.

An "Account of the Lives and Happy Deaths of some Indians Deceased on the Allegheny, Cattaraugus and Corn Planter Reservations," has been printed by direction of the Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for the Civilization and Improvement of the Indians.

This pamphlet, containing fifteen notices, some of them brief and others of considerable length, (especially that concerning Cynthia Halloon, one of our esteemed members) not only adds to the testimony of instances of the triumph of Christian faith on the approach of death, but is a comforting evidence of the reality of the concern of the Committee towards that people.

The concern for "the Civilization and Improvement of the Indians" at Tunesassa and elsewhere has by some critics been derided as if the official title of the Committee expressed all there was of "gospel" in the concern. Under whatever name a spiritually minded committee is appointed, their aim and work, even in its business features, is of spiritual service, and has its eye to the gospel, without which civilization and improvement are but empty names.

That which is the power of God unto salvation carries with it the power unto right civilization and improvement. Given the former, and the latter surely follows, in any people. Set up forms of the latter without Christ, and it is as a whited sepulchre. Having not the principle of saving life within itself, such civilization becomes as corrupt and spurious as did that of Greece and Rome.

We may safely acknowledge that were it not for a measure of the love of the gospel in our Yearly Meeting, this concern under the name of "civilization and improvement" would not be carried on. The work of Divine Grace in the hearts of men is the prevailing motive, and is held to be the one dependence for truly civilized improvement. While conducting this improvement by means of a God-fearing school and by faithful visitations to the Indians, and by self-sacrificing offices on their behalf, our committee and their coadjutors on the spot have been an instrument of seed-sowing which has borne fruit in true conversions, such as those of which the pamphlet before us shows instances.

We do not claim all these cases as directly traceable to the labors of our representatives in that field. They are in fact due to the operation of Divine grace as submitted to by obedient hearts. But the existence among that people of an institution and a godly care directing them by example and precept to the reality of spiritual truth and life in Jesus Christ, has been, we believe, a ministry clearly blessed to that end.

The Times for Gospel Testimony.

The professing church seems divided into three classes, as regards times deemed proper for the declaring or testifying of gospel truth. One recognizes as authorized only the stated times prearranged by the church. Another would make Opportunity the determining rule. The rule approved by the third is the witness of the Divine spirit, or immediate Authority.

The position of the first seems much broken in upon by Peter, whose charge to a divinely called minister was: "Preach the word. Be instant in season, out of season." This enjoins a preaching as possible outside of times of public worship, as if saying, Do not confine thy preaching to stated seasons. Be instant for the right opening everywhere and at any time. Times unseasonable to men's arrangements may be exactly in season with God's. "My times," said David, "are in thy hand, O Lord." The "out-of-season" preaching is incidental to every Christian's life as he passes on from day to day, a testimony always in order when in the Spirit. Moreover he is not asked to preach words, but the Word, the Divine message and life, the Word of God who is Christ; to be instant in season for the testimony of Jesus which is the spirit of prophecy. There are several forms of such testimony.

His spirit for vitalizing a testimony not being always at our command, any "opportunity" seized as a substitute for His spirit must leave the undertaken testimony spurious and abortive. The testimony delivered may be correct in point of veracity, but not for the time being the truth because not in the life. There is, indeed, a Divine opportunity for a good word or work, to which we must be instant, watchful, or on the alert; and that alone makes it a seasonable service, however inopportune it may outwardly seem. This alone can justify the word "opportunity" as a rule for testimony, namely a sense of its being the Lord's own time, His opportunity, and not one of the "any-and-every-available opportunities," independent of the dictate of His spirit's witness for the service. An apparent opportunity, however, does lay us responsible for watchfulness to inquire what the will of the Lord is for our use of it.

As regards the third standard of times for testimony, namely the witness of the Spirit for His own authorized moments in which a testimony is to be borne, an interesting recital of an opening to the mind of an aged Friend during his perusal of the Revised Version of the New Testament has come to hand, from which we prefer to quote in his own language:

Early on the appearance of the Revised Version of the Holy Scriptures, the writer obtained a copy and at times when free from other engagement, read thoughtfully, a considerable portion of the New Testament without discovering changes from the language of the long familiar and valued Bible published by the "Bible Association of Friends" or anything on account of which I would have considered a revision of the text of sufficient importance really to call for the labor and pecuniary cost which the undertaking involved. High regard however, for some of the men who were engaged in the revision encouraged a continued careful perusal.

Faithfulness to the original appeared to have been the manifest aim of those engaged in the great work and this was the criterion of my judgment as to the value of the new, compared with the long loved language of the old.

Although a few changes met with, were approved because of comformity with the original, yet a decided opinion as to the importance of a revision was not reached until on reading the second chapter of the Apostle Paul's Epistle to "his son" Timothy (fourth to seventh verses). Here, for a time, my eye ceased to follow the printed lines. A great far-reaching reality came to my view. The words, "the testimony to be borne in its own times" seemed to bring up the impression due to all my readings of dear George Fox's journal. No such renderings was contained in our so dearly loved Bible, and yet it seemed the very exemplification of the Divine original beaming upon me from all the literature of my people. Very often reflections upon this discovery have steadily deepened the impressions made upon my understanding. I have thought that due reflection upon this one unfolding of the need there was of revision should stir and animate the heart of each and every member of the Society of Friends and strengthen the inclinations toward it, of the many on whose minds and hearts light is dawning concerning the importance and value of that which is restored to us and to the world by the new version embodied in those words "the testimony to be borne in its own times." These words tell us and tell to all lovers of the Truth as it is in Jesus, that the Holy Spirit does furnish helpful ability to preach the gospel in the demonstration of its own precious influence.

Not only in the ministry of the gospel is the value of that helpful Holy Spirit to be appreciated. The humble, simple readers of the Scriptures are not left without comforting assurances of the value of the ever-present reality near and around about every believer who in simplicity looks for and depends upon it, the most favored minister of the gospel and the humblest of the hearers of the ministry.

Where is admonition found of greater value than this, given by the inspired apostle that the testimony to these great doctrines is to be borne in its own time? Here, at this point of unsurpassed importance and value, the former translators gave such rendering of those words of Scripture that they throw the door wide open for the diversified, man-made ministry that so abounds in the world, and shutting off those words which by the original Divine intent, would, probably have turned the feet of many from the idea of seeking in theological schools for a qualification for the ministry and inclining them to look more deeply into the source from which their goodly exercises and impressions came.

In less than forty years from the first publication of the Bible authorized by King James, the Lord, the author of the great gift of the Bible to mankind, raised up and qualified dear George Fox, who, with fellow laborers, introduced a ministry of the Gospel which was in accord with the direction Divinely given by Paul to Timothy and which characterizes the "ministry of true, faithful Friends" to the present day in which we truly have still preserved amongst us a goodly heritage. Do we appreciate and value and cherish it as we ought?

Advantage has been taken of the former rendering to introduce the wage system to the minds and spirits of those whose hearts yearn toward a religious life—to betray many even within the pale of our own Society—into the ruts of practices common in the "religious world" with those whose time is ever "due time," so that they have appointed times and stated services, all held to be allowed of by the "authorized version" that has so long been dear to us. The thousands of preachers and the millions of readers of the Bible, the members of Yearly Meetings of Friends, the "Christians" of all denominations, these all have had the Bible, precious indeed, but mutilated at one of its vital points. Had George Fox and his fellow-laborers, down to the present day been in possession of the Bible accurately translated, had they in their conflicts with hirleings been armed with that plain and simple testimony of Scripture is it probable that priesthood would have obtained such power to persecute—the power by which they rule even now?

Yes, in the absence of that Friendly-like clause of Scripture, now restored in the "revised version," what plausible devices in religious work have entered our bodies? In many places a reverent silent waiting upon God is not allowed to obtain. In cumulative degree the minds of those longest accustomed to the new ways, seem weaned from a disposition to realize silent worship in waiting upon God.

It will be noticed that the above communication was written in view of the fact that where the Authorized Version says: "Who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time" (1 Tim. ii: 6), the Revised Version reads, "Who gave himself a ransom for all, the testimony to be borne in its own times." The latter version has also rendered Titus i: 3 consistently thus: "God in his own seasons manifested his word in the message (proclamation) wherewith I was entrusted according to the commandment of God our Saviour." Paul also writes: "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God" (1 Peter iv: 11); or R. V.: "Speaking as it were oracles of God." The scribes, or scholars, are spoken of as speaking in the letter and text, and so perfunctory teachers, but the Master "as one having authority, and not as the scribes." But the standard of "speaking as it were oracles of God" represents the oracular speaking of the inspired ones.

Some would refer the expression "testimony in its own times" to the due time for the ushering in of the gospel dispensation, as "when the fulness of time was come God sent forth his Son," and "manifest in these last times," and "In due time Christ died for the ungodly." But this only goes to confirm the view that He has his own times as for his great works, so for all his works through his witnesses, knowing best how and when to speak to one's condition, or to the world's condition. His time is not always ready for our operations, and his testimony awaits its own right times, whether it h a dispensation for the world or a message f a soul. "He waiteth to be gracious," and as us in turn to await his own times. It is n for us to know the times or seasons which t Father hath put in his own power, but we sh receive power, as the witness of his Spir comes upon us and is heeded, to witness in h own times unto the conditions for speaking word in season anywhere. By such as are the watch to obey the testimony of his Spi in daily life, the right and Christian testimo will be borne in its own times and not in ou or man's.

The Glories of War.

Silly boys are captivated by gay uniforn military music, and the pomp and circumstan of war. But men who have seen war kn more about it. "War is hell," said one gr general.

Speaking of recent military operations t London News says:

"To-day the engines of war are again work. Carnage, havoc, such as we can faintly realize, must be the inevitable result the loosing of the dogs of war. This is no ti to blind our eyes or turn away from a ghas sight, because war is not in progress withi few miles of our own homes. We are separat after all, only by minutes from scenes wh the dying are in agony, where the shells scre through the air and plough up the earth, wh regiments march at the word of command i the jaws of death.

"It is but a few minutes away. Before last shot is fired we know how the battle beg It seems but yesterday that we inspected machine guns which hurl a continuous rai bullets, and latest rifles, acting like revolv and capable of carrying immense distan and other so-called improvements of mod means of warfare. The old soldier who plained the marvellous mechanism by whic seemed clear that a regiment might be aln annihilated by a few turns of a handle, g grave when we questioned him as to the ter of a battle in which such instruments v used. 'God keep us from it!' was all he s and his memory went back to the never-to forgotten field of Sedan. We have it on authority of Dr. Russel, an eye-witness of fight, that no nightmare could have bee frightful. 'No human eye,' he wrote, ' rested on such revolting sights. Conceive n bodies riddled with shot, and scattered and mbered limbs on every side, bodies lying skulls shattered, faces blown off, flesh and clothing all pounded together as if brayed mortar, extending for miles, not very thic any one place, but recurring perpetually weary hours; and then it is impossible, the most vivid imagination, to picture the ening reality of that butchery.'"

And this is glorious war!

Our expectations, our ideals, our hopes intentions in beginning life are generally al low. Many and many a one is only indiffer successful in living a strong life, becaus the start the standard of what one ougl be, and the belief in what one may be, set too low.—Charles Cuthbert Hall.

For "The Friend."

vailed myself of the invitation to keep my ters in the emigration building whilst in ec.

Seventh Month 3rd. A ferry boat was sent to Gross Isle at an early hour this A. M. supposed to be at the expense of the Dukhobors, it being reported that the steamship company, did not consider it their place to bring them, and later information has been to the effect that the charterers of the vessel have been liable for sixty pounds per day, for the expenses incurred at the quarantine for the support of the Dukhobors, amounting to about twelve hundred to fifteen hundred pounds in the aggregate; which has been the subject of a special appeal to have reimbursed. Five hundred or more were brought to the emigrant building about noon, including two hundred men, especially detailed to handle the baggage which had been landed when the steamship Lake Huron was released from quarantine.

In an interview with Dr. Montizambert (who is the head physician of the quarantine agencies, and quartered on both occasions of the detentions with the Dukhobors), he said that no case of small-pox had proved fatal; the deaths which had occurred were of the aged and feeble, and a few young children; he also said it was not nearly so trying on this occasion as it was last winter, when it was a great exercise to keep the buildings warm enough without getting them on fire.

Alexandre de Konchine came in the first boat from quarantine. He is reported to be a friend of Tolstoi, and came from Batoum as I understood in charge of the passengers. He appeared like a man of culture and refinement.

I had a passage on the boat that returned to Gross Isle, and whilst it was receiving its second load of five hundred and fifty-seven passengers with their baggage, I was allowed to enter the quarantine grounds, and take such a view of the arrangements and interview those there, as time would allow until the whistle of the steamboat summoned me back. During the passage of twenty-seven miles I mingled with the passengers, and with the aid of a Government interpreter could communicate with them in the religious opportunities afforded. Our craft was not a large one, and in approaching the landing about 9 P. M., I could appreciate the remark of Captain Taylor, of the Lake Superior, that the approach to the landing in the dark was critical. All got on the landing safely, with the exception of one boy who fell in the dock on the way from the boat to the emigrant building and was rescued with some difficulty. Most of those who arrived about noon took cars for Manitoba about seven o'clock.

Seventh Month 4th.—Being weary I retired pretty soon after the return from Gross Isle last evening, but was told that a train left about two o'clock this A. M. All however could not go, and the day and evening have been very interesting. It was no light matter to engage six trains of cars for the greater part of a week at a time when they were supposed to be most wanted for excursion parties, probably paying a higher rate of passage than immigrants were charged, and trains having been in readiness before it was known that passengers of the steamship Lake Huron were to be detained in quarantine, called for an exercise of patience at the emigrant building, until one train after another was furnished. This afforded a fine opportunity for mingling with the emigrants, as also with the people of character from the citizens of Quebec who were granted admission, and those who came on from Ottawa to take charge of the trains, the acquaintance with whom I prized, having had more or less intercourse with them on previous occasions.

The third boat load from quarantine arrived about noon, and the fourth in the latter part of the day, leaving twelve sick in the hospital there, and fourteen of their relatives with them. As might be supposed there was much to enlist the sympathy, and some scenes that were very touching. Some very aged who could not be left alone behind, and as yet fourteen hundred miles or more from their destination, which seemed doubtful if they could reach; one a hundred and three years old had to be carried, and he was not the only one that could not walk. An aged man with his wife, both said to be over ninety, were thankful they had not been cast into the sea. I saw one man carry his mother a distance of four or five hundred feet; a mother with an infant two days old walking the same distance.

I was called into a room in the second story of the emigrant building by a woman who wished to show me her aged mother, whom she had come from Winnipeg to meet; she was at first refused admittance into the quarantine when she had asked to go and be with her mother. I had rather pleaded for her, as she had probably been vaccinated when in a previous quarantine, and it would be a great comfort to the mother to have her. It being an unusual case, the authorities relented. This daughter had lost her husband, and all her sons were in exile, and to have obliged her either to travel back to Winnipeg disappointed, or spend her time during the quarantine in Quebec would have seemed uncalled for. The response she made in a religious opportunity when I first met with her gave evidence of deep religious feeling. She had her little tray set for me with some tea in a glass with lemon to season it, and some cake that she took pleasure in seeing me partake of, whilst I took satisfaction in knowing that she had her mother with her.

A train started off in the afternoon, leaving by the time the last company came from quarantine, making over one thousand in and around the emigrant building, who, when all settled in the hall and porches and under the baggage shed, prepared for a call, should there another train come in for them, exhibited a show of composure, cheerfulness and patience that was instructive.

Money was given the matron in charge at the building to buy milk for the children of each train, supposing there would be six trains, and it was interesting to see it dealt out, and how it was enjoyed. After the evening devotion, a company of youngish women went together in an open space in the enclosure, and embraced one another most affectionately, parting with a kiss and a single bow. It was supposed that they belonged to different villages, and they would be separated by the different trains to be differently located at their destination in the distant provinces. After these exercises were through with, and no prospect of the train of cars, arrangements were entered into for the night which was quickly and quietly accomplished. Two rows along the hall of the building leaving a passage way in the middle, one row on the porch, one on each of the sides and two rows under the baggage shed, and thus one thousand people were snugly laid away for the night. Felting and sheepskin coats were very useful.

A Letter from Elizabeth Rogers to her Niece Mary Haughton.

LISBURN, Ninth Month 3rd, 1829.

I have had and have abundant cause for thankfulness to that gracious Almighty Power who had been in abundant goodness pleased to lay His holy hand on me in mercy and draw me as with the silken cords of love, nearer and nearer, until I was made willing to return to my father's house like the prodigal son, where I believed there was plenty and to spare, whilst I suffered with want and privation of the only food that could nourish and sustain the soul. And now I can say from a feeling sense thereof "Thou invisible and powerful God, thou art pleased to prepare me by thy chastening rod, whilst thy sustaining arm was in mercy extended to support me during the mighty conflicts I have passed through. Thou hast kept me from sinking in the tempestuous water that hath raged about me. When the billows nearly overwhelmed me and I could see no way to escape the mighty command went forth, 'Be still,' and the tempest ceased. Great and marvellous are thy works, just and true are all thy ways, thou King of saints! Thou has been pleased to make those who sat in darkness see a great light and to those who have sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up. Surely this is life eternal to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou has sent. This is the only true and saving Faith, to experience His spiritual washing in the heart which if submitted to in humility, self-denial and watchfulness and faithfully bearing the cross as this Divine light shall point out, we shall happily come to the knowledge of the power of Christ, being indeed the resurrection and the life in the soul. Praise the Lord, O my soul, may all that is within me bow before thee in humility and self-abasement, strengthen my faith and confidence in thy mighty power, for without thy aid I can do nothing towards my own salvation. I know that in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength, and therein I hope to trust to the end!" Oh that it was in my power to convince the people how good the Lord is and how ready to help in the needful time, all who are willing to suffer the crucifying power that can purify the heart and would consume all but the pure gold. For those who hope to reign with Christ must suffer the death of the cross to their own self, working in an entire submission to the Divine will, be enabled to say, "Father, thy will be done." It was the language of our blessed Redeemer—He as man felt the cup was bitter. I hope I may not have said too much, but my heart is filled with love even to running over with desires that every one of my fellow creatures may come to the true knowledge, having their faith built on the rock of revelation against which the gates of hell cannot prevail.

My most affectionate love to thy dear husband and children; and may they never forget that self-denial, watchfulness and faithfully bearing the cross is the way to life eternal. For without the cross there is no crown.

ELIZABETH ROGERS.

The above-mentioned female was a native of the county of Wexford. Her parents were John and Mary Doyle, of Ballinamona, Friends belonging to Ballinclay Particular Meeting. When a young woman, about the year 1795, she went as teacher to the Ulster P. School, which station she filled with much satisfaction to Friends until she imbibed the pernicious errors of John Hancock and his adherents. She married John Rogers, of Lisburn, who was a young man of sober and serious mind, but getting contaminated with the same pernicious doctrine they were married in a very singular manner. Their marriage was published at the market place and accomplished in a private house before a few witnesses, the young man having a very stammering tongue, it was done without any expression of words, but merely by their signatures to their marriage certificate and the signatures of the witnesses.

They lived a good many years together, having settled in the town of Lisburn, and by every account were very moral in their lives. They went to no place of public worship, and disbelieving many or most of the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures, ceased in the perusal of them, and instead thereof read such publications as tended to draw them farther from the simplicity of truth. Falling into a poor state of poor health she began to be more thoughtful and anxious for the welfare of her immortal part, and probably from her observation for a number of years of the sorrowful fruits produced in the conduct and situation of many of those who had alike deviated from the path of Truth, whose principles produced blasting and mildew in a religious sense on themselves and their offspring, and seeing that she had been long feeding "on the husks which the swine did eat" she was drawn by Divine regard to her Heavenly Father's house who willeth all to repent, return and live, and in this state we find her declaring her repentance and acceptance with her God and merciful Creator. Her example has been a warning to all who tread in forbidden paths, and her restoration a glorious instance of Divine love. She did not long survive, and died in full assurance that her sins were forgiven, her iniquity was pardoned, and that she hath received at the Lord's hand double for all her sins.

WHAT BECOMES OF YOURS?—What do people do with their surplus time? They used to weave the cloth their garments were made of and make them by hand. They now get them ready-made at the stores. It takes less time to do every act of drudgery than it used to take. What becomes of the surplus time? If we have gained an hour over our ancestors, what becomes of it?—New York Telegraph.

The Christian Observer says: "The three Hebrew captives, Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, did a wise thing for themselves when they refused to enter into a debate before King Nebuchadnezzar, as to their bowing before an idol. They would not discuss, but simply answered to the effect that whether God would or would not deliver them from the fire, 'we will not serve thy gods nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.' If they had entered upon any discussion they might have weakened or been turned aside. But when they took a decided position that they would simply do right, they were on safe ground. In this there is a lesson for us all."

For "THE FRIEND."

Some Old Friendly Relics.

One day this summer I called in Devonsh House, London, to see Isaac Sharp; and v delighted there to meet with two Philadelp Friends. In the course of conversation he fered to show us some of the treasures sto in the strong rooms connected with the me ing house. To go over those old relics brir one strangely in touch with our early Frien They reveal that our predecessors in the Tr were after all men and women not very differ in some respects from ourselves. A short count of what Isaac Sharp so generously hibited may be of interest to some readers THE FRIEND.

We were first shown the Charter of Rele granted by Charles II., whereby some four h dred Friends who were lying in jail were set liberty. This great relief was largely brou about by the unremitting labors of Geo Whitehead, whose life and toil I wish w more largely familiar to some of the yo Friends of our day. The tale of this gr achievement is deeply interesting. The hist document on which we gazed consists of ele splendid pieces of parchment, each about thi five by twenty-four inches in size. Each pi is beautifully written, and the first page ha somely engrossed, including a fine portrait the merry and dissolute monarch who in case seems to have had his heart warr towards his unfortunate subjects. The gr seal is attached, a portion of which rema The name of each of the four hundred prisor is given in the charter eleven times. It i curious fact that John Bunyan, who was a gr enemy of Friends, was at that time also a p oner, and was included in the benefits of the lease, and his name appears in the charter al with that of those whose enemy he had b

Next we saw the first minute book kept London Yearly Meeting. The initial docum recorded was not a record of transactions, a copy of a letter or epistle sent out from gathering of Friends in London, and dated sixteenth of Eleventh Month, 1668. The regular minute in this book was that of twe ninth of Third Month, 1672. This old mir book, which so faithfully depicted the zeal works of that early day, is mostly written fine hand, a Friend named Ellis Hookes ha been recording clerk of the meeting for a g many years.

The shelves of this room contain a num of large volumes, about twelve by eight inches in size, narrating the sufferings of Friends. As cases of persecution were ta care of by the Meeting for Sufferings, were recorded in these massive volumes. last one was for the year 1856, and cont records of distraints for non-payment of chr rates. These were the original books f which Besse acquired his information wh was incorporated in the well-known Besse's ferings. What a record of human fidelity duty and of courage do those old manuscr contain. In them I saw recorded that a cer John Allen was "spoiled" in 1671, having taken from him "seven heifers, worth at l seventeen pounds." But this was a small t ble compared to many other instances na ted.

The most interesting book to me was which was kept in London about the clos seventeenth century during the brightest of Quakerism, wherein the ministers would e their names opposite a list of meetings-es, to show that they expected to go to in meetings on a particular First-day. In book the names of the many meetings in lon were put down, and the book carefully l; and it was generally arranged that two sters would attend each meeting. Thus sterial labor was divided for the good of nd as I scanned the list where two names recorded against each of those early ings, I read the signatures of John Es-h, William Penn, George Whitehead, and rs valiant for the Truth. On the following nd-days these ministers would meet in the ing and report their labors and the con-n of things where they had been the eding day. This Second-day morning meet-till exists under the name of the "Morn-fleeting."

nother strong room has some intensely ble relics of the early Friends. Here is reat arm-chair in which died John Wool-when on a religious visit to England—a , old-fashioned piece of furniture, quite ly upholstered all over, with head-rests e sides, and covered with faded red rep. is George Fox's Bible, a copy of Cram-Bible of 1541. How many flashes of holy came into his strong mind, as he had ed over those sacred pages! Here is part e travelling kit of Samuel Bownas; how its owner had grown weary as he cheer-accepted hardships which modern Friends ot called upon to endure! Here is Thomas 's desk — that early Friend who knew he believed and why he believed, had a riting desk. It is full of false bottoms and t drawers, and funny little corners, wherein vner could hide precious papers, instead ng the modern safe as we do. And so ht go down the list did time permit.

an American Friend, it is interesting to e the first, I believe, of publications is-by any Yearly Meeting in our country. is most likely the only copy extant. It ublished in 1686, was printed in Phila-ia by William Bradford on the first print-ess brought to the new city; and was a al epistle entitled "From the Church of lelphia." There is also one of the original ns of Barclay's Apology.

almost sacred seems the original letter en by William Robinson from Boston jail, the twelfth of Fifth Month, 1659, a short previous to his execution, a martyr for the of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is most ifully written in small letters, with a fine How those early worthies found cheer in Master, and cheered each other in Him, gh sufferings which our easy age can little ive of!

ain I recall some "testimonies" penned orge Fox regarding some of his deceased s, particularly concerning Ann White-

They are in George Fox's own hand-g. He used vigorous language, evidently just what he wanted to say, and his heart owed with love for God and man; but the compels me to say that he was not an ent penman, and was a very poor speller. eapot said to have belonged to George s in this wonderful collection. It is pos-about six inches high, and round, being of a very attractive form. It is made of china, but has a silver spout. The lettering, "G. F., 1680," is on it; and the china is prettily decorated. Fox, although somewhat of a utilitarian, had some very nice things, as I can attest, after having viewed other relics of his elsewhere.

I will conclude with telling about some of the William Penn relics. There is a number of old deeds, etc., of his, containing his well-known signature. Exceedingly valuable is a grant of land from Penn to his friend Pike, having attached to it his seal as Governor of Pennsylvania. It is a large seal, some four inches in diameter, and although broken, is almost intact. On it are the words, "mercy and justice," whilst on the other side is the sentiment, "Truth, Peace, Love and Plenty." What seemed very novel was to look on a marriage settlement between William Penn, third, and Christiana Forbes—a big document, as befitted such an important matter. It was dated 1698, and handsomely engrossed. This, I think, was the young man who at first was engaged to be married to a young woman Friend, but he afterwards desired to be released from the contract. She would not at first consent, but at last father Penn offered her one thousand pounds (five thousand dollars), and the Monthly Meetings also agreed to release young Penn from his engagement in consideration of that sum having been paid her. All of this little episode was duly recorded in the Monthly Meeting book, of Kingston Monthly Meeting—not Devonshire — and appears therein until this day.

Last but not least, I enjoyed a copy of the original edition of a book entitled "A Serious Apology for the Principles and Practices of the People called Quakers," etc., written jointly by George Whitehead and William Penn, published in 1671. This book, as became the ardent young Quaker, author and lover, had been presented by William Penn to his sweetheart, and bears date shortly before his marriage to her. On the fly leaf he had carefully written, "For my deare friend Gulielma Maria Springett, W. P." WM. C. ALLEN.

Eighth Month 26th, 1899.

What is Pharisaism? Pharisaism is religion without Christlikeness. And if our religion fail in this, is it not all a failure? The end of our redemption is to restore us to our first estate, to the image and likeness of God. All things are at work to this one end, that we be conformed to the image of His Son. If we have not His spirit we are none of His. If this likeness to our Lord be lacking, in vain we plead our beliefs, our prayers, our raptures, our associations, our gifts. From within the closed doors there comes the answer, grieved, yet unalterable, "I never knew you." So rings the dreadful doom of the religion that stops short of Christlikeness.—Mark Guy Pearse.

CHRIST must needs go through Samaria. It may not have been a pleasant route, it certainly was not a comfortable journey, but yet He must needs go. And there, as He sat, wearied, faint and hungry, on Jacob's well, He was enabled to proclaim the message of salvation to a lost and wandering soul, and thus bring to the Samaritans the words of grace and life.—The Christian.

For "THE FRIEND."

The following poem was found among the writings of the late Louis Taber, a beloved minister of Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends, who died Twelfth Month 7th, 1887, in his seventy-seventh year. It was dated less than a year previous.

THE AGED CHRISTIAN'S PSALM OF REST.

Wing-weary, from a storm tossed sea,
I have found those blessed isles of Rest,
On Thee, my Saviour, only Thee,
I lean and rest upon thy breast:

Partaker of the oil, the balm,
Robed in thy garments undefiled;
In a cloudless calm, on those isles of palm,
My Father's called and chosen child.

By angel wings the air is fanned;
Holy and sinless by my side
Thy saints adore and, forever more,
Thy name is honored, glorified.

Thy beauty in my face will shine;
Or life or death alike to me;
No wish but Thine, Thy will is mine,
I am settled, centred, lost in Thee.

Upon a waveless, peaceful shore,
Safe folded in thy love Divine,
I will trust thee o'er and mourn no more!
For Thou art mine and I am Thine.

Brief is my stay by fitful fires
Under the shadow of Thy wing;
Till I join the choirs with their golden lyres, Singing the songs Thy seraphim sing.

There He shall sit, the Ancient of Days,
The Lamb, who was slain, by his throne;
Prayer will raise to the voice of praise
In glory, in honor, to Thee alone.

So I watch and wait by a pearlen gate
That opens on streets of crystal and gold,
Where "their angel band" in that glorious land, Forever, O Father! Thy face may behold.

Selections from the Letters and Memoranda of Robert Milhous.

Eighth Mo. 20th, 1882.—In our little meeting to-day, E. F. spoke at some length on the great and glorious plan for our redemption out of our fallen estate, and of the mercies of our Heavenly Father in sending his only begotten Son into the world, to save us from our sins. The meeting closed under feelings of thankfulness and praise unto the Lord, for the fresh evidences of his Divine regard.

Twelfth Month 10th.—Under poverty and weakness I have again taken up my pen to record the fresh evidence with which I have been favored this day, of the Lord's continued mercy to me, a poor, unworthy creature. In our little meeting to-day, I apprehended myself called upon to speak a few words, concerning the universal love of our Heavenly Father, in which I felt strengthened to relieve my mind, beyond what I looked for, and I trust the praise was ascribed alone unto Him who is the Fountain of all good. May such seasons of favor be the means of strengthening my faith under trial, and of causing me to yield more unreservedly to the will of Him whom I desire to serve.

24th, First-day.—This day we attended the funeral of our friend William Llewelyn, who died from the kick of a horse, after several months of great suffering, perhaps about the sixteenth year of his age. How uncertain to us is the time of our sojourn here. A large company present at the funeral. Before retiring from the grave, an invitation was extended to all present, who felt a freedom to do so, to retire with us into our meeting-house, and soon after all were seated, a very solemn silence prevailed over the company, and apprehending myself called upon to rise to my feet, my mind seemed to be very solemnly impressed with a fresh sense of the universal love of our Heavenly Father to his creature man, and I felt strengthened to declare of his mercy and goodness and to point out the way to reconciliation with Him and a state of preparation for an admittance into his kingdom of rest and peace. I was favored to return to my home with the reward of sweet peace.

First Month 20th, 1883.—I thought it might be right for me, although under feelings of poverty, to record an exercise that attended my mind to attend Chesterfield Meeting on First-day, which I gave up to through much exercise, as some of my family were not well, but was favored to leave the meeting peaceful. Next day attended Plymouth Monthly Meeting, in which I seemed to be led forth in testimony, in regard to some subjects in which close doctrines seemed to be the burden of my spirit; left the meeting relieved and peaceful. Returned home and found my family all pretty well, for which I felt thankful. I greatly desire to be preserved from going abroad unsent, or of presuming to speak in the great and sacred name, without his preparation and putting forth.

Second Month 2nd.—Poverty and strippedness has been my portion of late; a state which I find often very needful in order to humble the creature as in the dust before the Lord.

Mauna Loa, the Hawaiian Volcano.

Anyone who drew his idea of volcanoes from the fanciful pictures used to illustrate geographies, etc., would be disappointed, as I was, in his first view of the great volcanoes of Hawaii. Volcanoes ought to terminate in a sharp cone-like apex, and some do, but this is not the way with Hawaiian volcanoes. Again, the stereotyped idea is that a volcano when in action spouts a great geyser of lava right out of its peak. Here too the Hawaiian volcano is disappointing, for it has never been known to develop a flow of lava from the top; all the eruptions so far have been from leaks, as it were, in the side of the mountain. Indeed this was true also of the volcano that destroyed Pompeii. Ninety-nine people out of a hundred would say it was Vesuvius that caused this great catastrophe, but it was not from Vesuvius that the destructive flow came, but from a new outlet, now known as Mount Somma. True, in Hawaii, both Mauna Loa and Kilauea have great craters at their summit ten miles or so in circumference, and at the bottom of these a brew is always steaming, and occasionally seething and spouting up, but within the period of tradition these craters have never filled up and overflowed. The sides of the mountain are too weak to support such a terrific strain as this would be, and they invariably give way and let the molten lava escape before this level can be raised very high.

It should be recalled that the island of Hawaii, from which the group takes its name, though the largest in size, is not the most important. Oahu, several hundred miles to the north, is the best known of the islands; Honolulu being situated on it. On the island of Hawaii, however, is the important city of Hilo, second only in size to the capital. It is this city that is now threatened with the flow of lava from Mauna Loa.

Every one who pretends to see the sights of the islands visits the crater of Kilauea, which is only four thousand feet above the sea, but it is an undertaking requiring great physical strength, endurance and will to ascend to the summit of Mauna Loa, which is almost ten thousand feet higher. There is a hotel, the Volcano House, on the brink of the crater of Kilauea, which is readily accessible from Hilo, and tourists thus have an easy way to visit one of the most interesting craters in the world. To go to the top of Mauna Loa you must have an experienced native guide, for the summit of the mountain is generally wrapped in clouds, and anyone who attempted to find his own route would inevitably be discouraged long before he reached the summit. At best it is a two days' trip, and provisions must be carried along. Even in this tropical climate an altitude of nearly fourteen thousand feet takes one up into the region of almost perpetual snows. The sister mountain of Mauna Kea always has its summit crowned with snow, but by some meteorological mystery Mauna Loa, which is practically of the same height, is generally free from snow. Nevertheless, the traveller who explores its summit must be prepared for Arctic weather. His skin is parched by the glaring heat of the sun, while every lava block he touches is like a block of ice. Moreover, the air at such an altitude is so thin that you can only breathe with difficulty, and the very time when you need all your breath—on the terrific climb up the last cone to the crater—you can only get your breath in short gasps. Then too you are liable to be attacked with nose-bleeding or with the mountain sickness.

At first, as you leave Kilauea, the way leads through scrub timber, but as you approach the higher levels this gives way until at last there is not a blade of vegetation to yield shade or cheer the eye. It takes centuries for plant life to gain a hold on the inhospitable lava and reclaim it. The plant that grows highest up is the "silver sword"—a lily-like plant with long silken leaves and small flowers. This is the edelweiss of Hawaii, and anyone who picks it must have braved the difficulties of high-mountain climbing. From Hilo, Mauna Kea presents a grand aspect, while Mauna Loa looks insignificant. Mauna Loa has no distinct summit; it is only a big hill, with gentle slopes and rounding top, and there is something about its shape that detracts from its height.

The last thousand feet of ascent is very difficult, being over wastes of jumbled lava blocks which are terribly sharp and jagged.

You are constantly lured on by the smoke from the crater. It appears to be only just beyond the next ridge of lava. When you have gained that, however, you see the smoke still further on. This is almost enough to dishearten even the most courageous, but at length all of a sudden you find yourself standing on the brink of the crater, with a great abysmal gulf yawning five hundred feet deep before you. You can, if you feel a little foolhardy, climb down to the floor of the crater. The lava is here so hot that you don't care to stand in the same place long. There is a great subter nean muttering and rumbling, and from vent holes charges of hot lava are intern tently gorged up, while the sulphurous fur are stifling. Of course there is no absol guaranty that the bottom will not drop out the crater while you are right there, and as thought gets hold of you you begin to cli out as hurriedly as the conditions will perr

Mauna Kea has long been extinct, and Mau Loa, Kilauea and Hualalai are the only th volcanoes that ever slop over now, though th are dozens of dry cones all over the islar From any height you can easily remark course of the lava rivers that have issued fr different ruptures of the mountain-side in p times. The two flows of 1868 and 1887 close together at the southern point of island, one coming from a vent ten miles inla the other from one twenty miles inland. former had the speed of ten miles in two ho which seems to be the record. The largest most menacing flows have broken out very cl together and have followed almost the sa course. The flow of 1852 was the first of group. It was headed in the direction of H but cooled off and stopped a few miles out the town. Three years later another broke out on the same flank of the mount followed the same course, threatened Hilo o more and stopped after flowing uninterrupte for fifteen months; its edge was only ei miles from Hilo when it congealed. Agai 1880 Hilo was attacked. For nine months stream rolled along. Every day it made s advance, every week it was a mile or so nea and it never swerved in its direction. It aimed directly at Hilo, and there seemed hope for the city, from which the people be to move in terror. When that flow stoppe was only three-quarters of a mile from populous part of the town. There are t outbreaks together in the present erupt each on a different flank of the mountain. one of these outbreaks, the largest one, i the same place where three others have br through and aimed at the city below.—R Haliburton, in The Pathfinder.

In the Shawangunk Mountains.

It is pleasant and profitable to those feel like having a change from their ordi homes, in warm weather, and especially those who reside in cities or towns and fee need of it, to find at times in pure mour air, with good water and beautiful and exte views, as well as great variety of scer places where they can rest, enjoy nature recruit their health, away from the slaver fashion; whilst surrounded by truly cultiv and highly refined people, who value you appear to do so) for what they think you rather than for what you are supposed to sess, in goods or fame.

One such delightful place was recently f by three relatives and the writer, in the S angunk Mountains, Ulster County, New Y where we had on First-day our quiet Fri meeting in the parlor of the principal boar house—at Cragsmoor; (Herrnhut House) thirty or more persons attending, nearly whom were members of our Society.

Lake Awoosting was seen in the distance, near the top of the Shawangunk Mountain range, and we walked by Lake Maratanza on our return from Kaeterkill Falls, the latter lake being only a few miles from our stopping place, and about 2000 feet above sea level.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Patrick Not a Salaried Preacher.

Reading a short time ago a plea for stated pastoral support by one holding membership in the Society of Friends, it was re-assuring to meet with the following passage from "The Story of Saint Patrick" lately compiled by Joseph Sanderson.

Patrick's father, Calpornius, was a deacon, and his grandfather, Potitus, a presbyter, both, therefore, though clergyman, being married, and presumably not advocates of that enforced priestly celibacy officially promulgated about two centuries later (A. D. 566) by the Council of Tours.

"The fact," says Sanderson, "that Calpornius, a clergyman, held a farm, and was a local town councillor, conflicts in no way with the usages of the time. It is certain that in the early centuries clergymen of whatever name, earned their bread by their own toil, as Paul did. The history of those days makes it plain that clergymen cultivated farms, kept shops and banks, acted as physicians, shepherds, smiths and artificers of all kinds. Hatch, a celebrated historian and lecturer, tells of one clergyman who was a weaver, of another who was a shepherd on the mountains of Cyprus, of another who practised in the courts of law, of another who was a silversmith, and of another who was an inn-keeper at Ancyra. Patrick's own nephew, though a clergyman, was a pilot, and of those clergymen who were Patrick's companions one was a smith, and another was a maker of satchels for books. Patrick himself was poor, and performed gratuitously the functions of his calling, as did the Apostle to the Gentiles. There is no evidence in early Christian literature that the pursuit of a secular calling was incompatible with the office of the Christian ministry. The proposal of the Montanists to pay a fixed salary to the clergy was condemned as an innovation alien to all prevailing usage. Salaries to clergy and their withdrawal from secular calling came into the church when it was losing its spirituality."

The above testimony may certainly be deemed to be unprejudiced, being declared by one who appends both "D. D." and "LL.D." to his name. He further says "What Patrick values and emphasizes most is the fact which he asserts, and to which he refers again and again, that he received his call from a higher than any earthly source—that his mission was from God; and he seems always to take pleasure in relating the circumstances in which the Divine voice spake to him, and in adding: 'I testify in truth and in joy of heart, before God and his holy angels, that I never had any reason except the gospel and its promises for ever returning to that people from whom I had formerly escaped with difficulty.'" So, in his Confession, Patrick says "Wherefore, though I could wish to leave them, and had been most willingly prepared to proceed to the Britains as to my country and parents; and that not only, but even to go as far as to the Gauls, to visit the brethren and to see the face of the saints of the Lord—God knows that I greatly desired it—but I am bound in the Spirit, who witnesseth to me that if I should do this he would hold me guilty; and I fear to lose the labor I have commenced; and not I, but Christ the Lord, who commanded me to come and be with them for the rest of my life. If the Lord will, and if He will keep me from every evil way that I may not sin before Him." This sounds almost like a passage from D. Wheeler or S. Grellet. Good reason there appears to be for Patrick's biographer concluding: "There is not the shadow of a proof that he was ever at Rome, or that any pope commissioned him to proceed on a mission to Ireland; nor is there any evidence whatever that he was licensed to preach by any human authority, or ordained by any man or body of men, or delegated by any creature. He appears to have been appointed to his work by God, without the official sanction of man." While Ireland's so-called "patron saint" may well be claimed as of the church Catholic, universal, it is evident there is no consistent place for the appendage Roman.

Notes from Others.

Bedlam (Middle English, Bedlam), stands for Bethlem, Bethlehem. It was the name of the Hospital of St. Mary of Bethlehem, in London, founded as a priory in 1247, with the special duty of receiving and entertaining the Bishop of St. Mary of Bethlehem, and the canons, etc., of this, the mother church, as often as they might come to England. In 1330 it is mentioned as "an hospital," and in 1402 as a hospital for lunatics; in 1346 it was received under the protection of the city of London, and on the dissolution of monasteries it was granted to the mayor and citizens, and in 1547 incorporated as a royal foundation for the reception of lunatics. Thence the modern sense.—N. Y. Tribune.

A most remarkable union has taken place in Persia recently, or rather it should be called an absorption of almost the whole body of the Nestorians by the Greek Church of Russia. For several years a few missionaries from the Greek Church have been working to bring the Nestorians over, and the latest news is that they have succeeded in a most remarkable manner. Nestorians are so named from Nestorius, their founder, and have existed since the fourth century. The Roman Catholics have been at work also among them, but not with remarkable success. There is also a Protestant mission in Persia, which stands it out bravely. In this change there is little more than change of name. But it adds many thousands to the membership of the Greek Church, and it is probably only the beginning of conquests by that Church.

The existence of the various denominations, we believe, then, to be a necessity for two reasons: First, because each true denomination has in it some truth or phase of truth different from any other denomination, and this truth will live forever; secondly, because in these different denominations men and women can find church homes suited to their own peculiar temperaments. . . Each true denomination, we remarked, stands for some principle which will live for ever, for "the one eternal truth of God reflects itself in the minds of men in many peculiar forms." "The Holy Ghost speaks in ten thousand tongues." We may not be able to lay our finger on the ever-abiding principle, yet we believe that it is there.—Reformed Church Messenger.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States Treasury statement shows that the amount of net gold on hand was $247,880,601, which is the largest amount on hand at one time in the history of the Department. The receipts for Eighth Month exceeded the expenditures by nearly $4,500,000.

The income from the war revenue taxes for the last fiscal year was $102,617,763; over $37,000,000 was obtained from stamp taxes.

The annual report of Commissioner of Pensions Evans for the fiscal year ended Sixth Month 30th last shows the total number of pensioners to be 991,519, a decrease of 2195 in one year. The amount paid to pensioners in the year was $131,617,961, being $649,498 more than ever before. The roll contains the names of 553,451 surviving soldiers, the remainder being dependent relatives. There are four surviving widows and seven surviving daughters of the Revolutionary War, and one surviving soldier of the War of 1812.

The Secretary of War has designated the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation as depository of the Department for the Philippine Islands, the corporation having given a bond of $1,000,000.

The Army Commissary Department is now buying coffee in Porto Rico for supplying the army in that island and Cuba. This action has been taken as a measure of relief.

The Insular Commission has submitted to Secretary Root, a code of laws for Porto Rico. The Civil Government for the Island, will abrogate all Spanish laws and Royal decrees, no provision is made for elections. The Commission desire that the change be made at once, by order of the President.

The cotton receipts in Montgomery for the year ending Ninth Month 1st, were 170,072 bales, the largest in the history of Montgomery. Business in all branches has been satisfactory and merchants are hopeful of better results the coming year. There is an absolute certainty of abundant food crops throughout the whole State, and there has been greater diversity in farming than ever before.

To effect a combination of trusts is the scheme of a Cleveland, Ohio man, who has taken out papers of incorporation for the Central Company. By this means he proposes to use all industrial power in reach, with a consequent increase in wealth so rapid as to change the whole condition of society.

A despatch to the Public Ledger of Eighth Month 30th from Allentown, Pa., says: "Negotiations for the purchase of the plant of the American Cement Company at Egypt, this county terminated to-day in the sale of the concern to E. B. Smith & Co., bankers, of Philadelphia. The consideration is $2,500,000. The plant consists of five mills, with a daily output of 4000 barrels. With the plant is sold a tract of land underlaid with cement rock, giving the company an inexhaustible supply of raw material."

On the same day the following came from Pittsburg: "A continuance of the extraordinary demand for every variety of material in every stage of production, with the maintenance of the upward movement in prices, are the features of the week's transactions in the metal markets.

"Furnace men have their production sold through the first six months of 1900, and at an advance that is materially higher than what was regarded as good prices for 1899. The rate at Pittsburg for Bessemer is $23@23.25, a slight advance over last week, and with the raise comes the announcement that this price is on the sales up to Seventh Month, 1900. Foundry irons have advanced in the same ratio with Bessemer, and higher prices here are regarded as a certainty by the first of next month. Bar iron has taken on another advance and is as active as any other line, at $2.40@2.50."

Disastrous forest fires are raging in Calhoun County, Arkansas. Fire fighters are working night and day, and several have been prostrated from heat. The fires have devastated a large area.

There were 336 deaths in this city last week, which is 70 less than the previous week and 77 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 79 were children under one year of age; 164 were males and 172 females: 37 died of consumption; 28 of heart diseases; 24 of cholera infantum; 22 of marasmus; 21 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 14 of pneumonia; 13 of nephritis; 12 of diphtheria; 10 of old age; 10 of apoplexy, and 10 of convulsions.

FOREIGN.—The millenienth anniversary of the death of Alfred the Great, King of England, who died A. D. 901, is proposed to be commemorated by his descendants in 1901. These are believed to number several millions, not a hundredth of them probably are aware of their ancestry. Edward Foulke, who with his wife and nine children emigrated from Wales and settled at Gwynned, Pennsylvania, in 1698, and who has several thousand descendants now living—a number of whom are readers of THE FRIEND—was of the twenty-sixth generation from King Alfred, whose descendant, Matilda of the eighth generation, married Henry 1, King of England. Thence through the Royal line of the Plantagenets we come to King Edward 1. Edward's daughter, Eleanor, married Henri Count de Barr, and Edward Foulke was a descendant of the last named couple of the twelfth generation—all the connecting links of both sexes being on record.

Great Britain still faces a crisis in South Africa, but there is still hope of a diplomatic settlement.

British Secretary Chamberlain has made public the despatches with President Kruger growing out of the Transvaal issue, and as indicating a continuance of the crisis military activity continues in England and at Cape Colony. President Kruger is reported to have said that he expects war, and the Boers are fully armed.

Hveen, a little Danish island in the Sound, half way between Seeland and the Swedish coast, and only fifteen miles from Copenhagen, is being bargained for by a German syndicate which wishes to turn the island into a gambling resort like Monte Carlo. We hope not!

Several new and serious cases of bubonic plague officially are reported at Oporto, and a sanitary cordon has been formed around the city.

In Germany potato bread is used by the natives of Thuringia to feed their horses, especially when they are worked hard in very cold weather. The animals thrive on it, and their health and strength are excellent.

Near the town of Capljina, in Bosnia, archæologists have exhumed a new Pompeii in the form of a Roman camp. All the walls are well preserved, and some of the rooms are decorated with fine paintings, while weapons, lamps and various other objects have been found in them.

It has been announced that the Russian Minister at Pekin, De Giers, and the British Charge d'Affaires, Bax Ironside, to submit the Hankow incident to arbitration.

Cherrapunji, in Assam, northeast of Calcutta, has the reputation of being the wettest place in the earth, the average annual rainfall being 493.15 inches, while it has the record of one month in which 147.17 inches fell.

Argogula, an insurgent stronghold in Negros, was captured recently by the United States troops under Lieutenant-Colonel Byrne. Many of the insurgents were wounded and captured, and twenty-one were killed. The American scaled a steep, almost perpendicular slope, being constantly under fire for 1000 feet.

General Brooke has reported from Havana that the Cuban army had been paid, and that of the $3,000,000 set apart for that purpose there was on hand a balance of $400,000.

President Figueroo, of the Republic of San Domingo, has yielded up his office on the demand of the revolutionists, whose cause is thus made victorious. The abdication is said to have been in favor of General Jiminez, who may at the coming election be chosen Chief Magistrate of the Republic. He has been released from arrest in Cuba.

San Domingo advices state that the cities of Santiago and Puerto Plata have proclaimed in favor of General Jiminez for the Presidency, and that a provisional government has been set up.

There are 850,000 men in the world who gain a livelihood chiefly by fishing, making an annual catch of $225 worth of fish for each man. The fisheries of the United States supply 800,000 pounds annually, and those of Europe 1,800,000 pounds. The American citizen eats about 25 pounds of fish and 140 pounds of meat in a year, while the European eats 64 pounds of meat and 11 pounds of fish annually.

He and I bade fare- ı tears, he expecting to sail next day on eamship Ontario, with Captain Taylor for ool. I took an early train for Montreal, ed to some business there, then went on awa, and had interviews with heads of ments, setting before them the needs Dukhobors as they appeared to me. ing heard of Eliza H. We saw me women that we saw at the immigrant ig. They are mostly of the Cyprus ny. The men were troubled with their nd one had gone blind, but seemed so ed to his situation and was even cheer- ful. Two children we saw were sad to behold, one had cancer of the nose—a child of seven or eight; her mother had her on her lap. The nostrils are closed and the nose out of shape, very much so with the growth. We all were brought near in spirit, and bowed down before the Lord. Truly a broken and contrite spirit, O God, thou wilt not despise!

This morning went back to Selkirk, where we met over a thousand of the Dukhobors. They welcomed our coming, and after visiting the sick, who are under the care of their nurse or doctor, that came with them, I asked her if she would kindly tell me what they were most in need of. She replied that the sick and the children were much in need of milk and eggs, but she had no means to get them. I gave her ten dollars of what thou left me, and Job S. Gidley gave ten of what he brought with him. We then went to the large tent, and had a very favored sitting with them, which brought them very near in spirit. They chanted for about ten minutes, when one of the Russians offered prayer. He was deeply interested in what was said to them, at times seemed almost overcome; he had evidently been well brought up, and seemed anxious to help me.

Whilst we were at dinner one of their women came to ask if it would disturb us if they sang in the large room, their interpreter said "No," so they chanted all the time we were eating. After dinner we came out into the large room and found that outside the doors they had a large number of children collected in a half circle with the men and women at either end, and on our stepping out, all these children, one hundred and fifty or more bowed down three times in humble gratitude for what had been given for their benefit, the nurse having told them what had been given her before dinner. We could not understand their movements until she explained. The children were then feelingly addressed. Many of these children have the most open, kind-hearted faces I ever beheld. Just before leaving, J. S. G. had them called together, over a thousand of them, and gave them excellent counsel, which they took very kindly, and had their interpreter thank us for our sympathy and words of comfort.

It was a scene never to be forgotten. The men are so anxious to be at work and earning something, they hardly know how to wait. They were encouraged to be patient and in due time the Lord would make a way for them where there seemed to be no way. We then bade them farewell. To-morrow morning we leave for Yorkton.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM WILLIAM HALSTEAD, UNDER DATE OF EIGHTH MONTH 4TH, 1899.

Joseph S. Elkinton,

My Dear Friend:— . . How precious it is to know that we belong to our Heavenly Father, and that we are all one in Jesus Christ, who loved us and gave himself for us.

I am pleased to say that the prospects of our Canadian West are more and more encouraging. There will be much railroad building, and this season it is likely that a great number of men will be needed for the saving of a bountiful harvest, so that our friends from Russia will be able to get plenty of honest employment.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM WILLIAM BELLOWS.

SELKIRK, Manitoba, Seventh Month 7th, 1899.

I returned with Dr. Mercer to Yorkton three or four days ago, and after spending a night at that place, came on to Winnipeg, where I went to see W. F. McCreary. From him I learnt that the Kars Dukhobors (Lake Huron), were already on their way west, and that some were expected to arrive at Selkirk without delay. As McCreary intended to come down to Selkirk to meet the trains and see them settled in, I decided to come with him, and accordingly we left Winnipeg last evening by the Imperial Limited, accompanied by Leanhardt the interpreter. Arrived at Selkirk at about half past ten at night, we waited at the station for an hour or so and then had news by wire that the first train from Quebec would soon be in.

It was a strange and striking sight to see these poor people leaving the train, by starlight, and heavily loaded up with their private belongings, bourkas, sheepskins, etc., making their way along the mile of road leading to the immigration shelter.

An hour or so after the arrival of the first train the second came in, bringing part only for Selkirk, the remainder proceeding via Winnipeg to Yorkton. By this time it was early morning, and we were glad to get a few hours' sleep in the small bedrooms upstairs. The Dukhobors were not long in going into the details of their new home, and on rising this morning the noise of conversation amongst them downstairs in the main building might be likened to that of a mill. A Russian gentleman from Moscow, named Konshin, has accompanied them from Batoum, and he and W. F. McCreary went to Winnipeg by this afternoon's train. The former intends, I think, to go down into the Mennonite settlements to buy horses in a day or so, and then a delegation representing all the Kars Dukhobors will proceed to the Saskatoon and Prince Albert district to "search out the land." They seem anxious, I fancy, to settle in that part of Canada, if possible.

A few of them went to Winnipeg by this afternoon's train, one of them with the intention of selling some Persian rugs that they have brought from Tiflis. Some of the latter are really nice articles, and I am told that they will easily be able to dispose of them at Winnipeg.

There are a great many wild strawberries near here, and the children have been out picking them to-day with the result that to-night I saw some women busily making a great many strawberry tarts. It is nice to think that they can enjoy the luxury so cheaply.

The ex-president of the C. P. R., Sir W. Vanlorne, is on the point of starting a very large farm close to this point, and I hope some work may be found for the Dukhobors upon it. It is intended to act as a permanent advertisement of the suitability of the land, to catch the eye of settlers coming into Manitoba.

The principal events, for this evening, have been the erection of a large tent for the storage of baggage just outside the building, and the arrival of the third train from the east with four hundred and one on board. Two of the Dukhobors on this train got accidentally left behind on the track, but will doubtless be here to-morrow.

THE ORIGIN OF BOWING.—The probability is that the origin of this custom could only be found by going far back into the age of antiquity, when prostration was the attitude of the slave before his master. In short, what we now call politeness began in servility. There can hardly be any doubt but that the practice of bowing the head originated in exposing the neck to the stroke of the sword. From its earliest literal meaning it took a figurative one, meaning first submission, then deference, then mere politeness. As Herbert Spencer says, "The nod or bow of modern politeness is the last relic of the prostration of ancient servility." In the same way we shake hands with the right instead of the left, because the right was the sword hand, and the giving of it into the hand of an enemy was a sign of peace and good faith. Taking off the hat, too, is a relic of doffing the helmet, and so leaving the most vulnerable portion of the body undefended as a mark of confidence on entering the dwelling of an ally or friend.—Pearson's Weekly.

THE RICHEST MAN IN THE COUNTY.—Thus the Pittsburg Advocate speaks of the "greatest things in the world." It reminds us of an incident heard many years ago. A rich man in Harris County dreamed that the richest man in the county would die at six o'clock on a certain morning. This dream was repeated three times, and it greatly troubled him, as he was reputed to be the richest man in the county, and supposed the dream referred to himself. He made all his arrangements to meet the issue, and had the doctor and his family at hand at the eventful hour to minister to his needs. The morning and the hour came and passed, and no "pale horse" was in sight. The man arose relieved, and went into his farm. Very soon one of the men came up and informed him that the old man in the cabin across the branch had died that morning. "Ah!" said the rich man, "he is the man I was dreaming about, he was the richest man in Harris County. I gave him the cabin because he had nowhere else to go. I found him one morning eating his breakfast at the spring. It consisted of dry bread, soaked in water. I said something to him about his poverty. He resented the idea, and said that he was the son of the King. He went on to speak of the wealth of his Father in heaven, and how happy he was in his inheritance, until his face glowed with the heavenly light. Yes, he was truly the richest man in Harris County."

Merit.

"I have seen an end of all perfection, but thy commandment is exceeding broad" (Ps. cxix: 96).

It has been remarked by a celebrated author, as a characteristic of the unsophisticated vigor of the earnestly inquiring mind, that "things take the signature of thought." The longer we live, if we live deliberately and independently, the more fully do we realize the fact that external nature is but a mirror upon which are shadowed in demonstrable outlines of beauty or deformity, the principles of our interior experience. To assert this, even in anticipation of the realization, would be but to extend to our human nature, the observation which we all find to be true in subordinate spheres of knowledge, that force is even interior to form. In both cases is the force, or life, concealed by the form, or body, and yet revealed by it. Indeed it may be said to be concealed by it in order that it may be revealed by it, as the ordained channel for the communication of intelligence. It is thus that the material world may be said to confess itself the servant of the spiritual, ever closely following and legibly registering its progress in the harmony and power of truth.

Never, indeed, without conflict, is the supremacy of the ideal over the actual experimentally maintained. The spiritual domain of emotions and motives must witness a triumph within itself over the intrusive suggestions of sloth and discord, before it can manifest itself in efficient and harmonious action. Only by perseverance in the uncompromising warfare which the Son of God, and Saviour of men, descended from heaven to institute, and lives in heaven to direct, are the eternal freshness and power of truth to be realized in inward and outward fruits of happiness and peace and glory. The life of the faithful Christian, and it alone, is endowed with the subtle graces and genuine activity of perennial youth.

Youth itself, however, may be said to be a form, as well as a force. As a phenomenon of time and space, it bears precedence among the controlling conditions of every individual existence. Through the neglect of its spiritual potentialities it may become a decaying and corrupt form; but as it is animated by the love of truth and duty, it is found to be at once firmly conservative and irresistibly progressive. By the exercise of the Divine charity which believes, hopes, and endures all things, while it may seemingly ignore the existence of essential evil, it grasps and wields the only weapons which can oppose and overcome it. Steadfastly ceasing to do evil in its own preconceived forms of work, it as steadfastly learns to do well in the life of faith; and its path is "as a shining light, shining more and more unto the perfect day." The perfection of yesterday may become the imperfection of to-day; but the "exceeding broad commandment" remains to conduct it onward to the perfect manhood of "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

It is perhaps one of the least imperfect or improper, and therefore one of the most persistent and most useful allusions of the youthful pilgrim, to place more or less confidence in the fallible authority of his fellow-man. The prescription of tradition, and the prestige of service, seem to him to invest merely occasional rules and merely mortal examples, with the sanction of universal and enduring applicabil By them he is willing to be guided, and them he would fain appeal "that his de may be made manifest that they are wrou in God." For only as the education of nat is entirely subordinated to that of grace, is promised sonship attained, whose happines is to distinguish the one immediate, undecei and Divine Light, from all transmitted or flected radiance. But so far as the stand and the sanction of the Christian neoph may be thus in the keeping of his fellow-m he cannot "be fully persuaded in his mind," and his store of rejoicing must be cordingly not in himself, but "in anoth The depth and fulness of the promise, "w my father and my mother forsake me, t the Lord will take me up," must remain t realized by him. One by one his mortal thorities must fail to fulfil his purest expe tions, as they more or less gradually ex their own natural limitations; while still oth will be at hand to attract the allegiance of imperfect faith, until the revelation of ri eousness in the gospel "from faith to fai shall finally emancipate him from all dep ence upon mortal priesthoods. Then wil first fully realize with regard to his fell that which he may perhaps long before l discovered with regard to himself, that w ever merit there may be in human works, t is none in the human worker; but in Him shall have wrought all their works in them xxvi: 12.) FOR "THE FRIEN

MERIT.

'Tis said by self-made millionaires,
That of the gains which crown their lifelong care
The first five hundred for the whole prepares.

They speak of what they partly know:
The real mine in which their nuggets grow,
Is the fixed method which their labors show.

Fixed method tells of single aim;
Of will unbound by brute affection's claim,
Or selfish passion's countless cords of shame.

Thus for his earthly crown contends,
With all the singleness such service lends,
The man who trusts by gold to shape his ends.

In earnest work true merit lies;
Not in the worker, be he ne'er so wise,
But in the fruits which grow beneath his eyes.

Then leave the miser to his rule:
Perchance he yet may find a nobler school
In which his works shall never call him "fool."

And if thy power thou wouldst exert
Where wisdom's ways their lasting charms asse
Let not his abject fears thy will pervert.

WE put offences or stumbling blocks i way of men's souls whenever we do any to keep them back from Christ, or to turn out of the way of salvation, or to disgust with true religion. We may do it direct persecuting, ridiculing, opposing, or dissu them from decided serving of Christ. W do it indirectly by living a life inconsistent our religious profession, and by making tianity loathsome and distasteful by ou conduct. Whenever we do anything o kind, it is clear, from our Lord's words we commit a great sin.—B. P. Lyle.

Prohibition in Maine.

BY JOSHUA L. BAILY.

a recent issue of THE FRIEND reference nade to one of our members visiting g the cities of Maine to investigate the s of Prohibition. As it is probable some r readers may be interested to know the , we publish this advance copy of his nt.—ED.]

a recent visit which I made in Maine, one chief objects was to observe the working prohibitory law of that State. While I many persons who considered the law in ge measure successful, I was somewhat sed at the number of those who con- ed it as a failure. I found the latter were o classes; those who were opposed to the nd would like to have it repealed, because ne interest which they had in the liquor ss, or because it interfered with or re- ed the indulgence of their appetite. The class was made up chiefly of those who sed to be Prohibitionists, but who pro- ed the law a failure because it did not suppress the traffic.

solved to make an investigation for my- nd availed of every opportunity that of- for obtaining information. I spent three in Portland. At one of the principal where I dined I noticed the menu con- no wine list, and I asked the waiter the for it. He told me the law would not it. Had I dined at any prominent hotel ost any other city, New York, Philadel- r Boston, I would have been confronted wine list covering a whole page. At a nent hotel where I dined recently in an- city, there were seventy-three kinds of named on the wine list, seventy-three in- ons to drink. All of these were wanting e Portland Hotel. Methought the law nly doesn't fail in this. I noticed there o wines or other alcoholic liquors on the

The popping of corks, so observable at hotels, was wanting here. I asked the if one could not have a bottle of wine; oked very much surprised and told me the Maine law, no doubt thinking I was gnorant. Again, I thought the law doesn't this.

ok up two of the principal newspapers of nd, "The Argus" and "The Express." ed through them column after column, where found any liquors advertised for any information as to where they could . There was beef, but no beer; bread, brandy; corn and oats, and wheat, but iskey; dry goods and clothing and gro- but no liquors of any kind. In almost per in any other city outside of Maine I have no difficulty in finding where every f liquor could be had, either in the small- the largest quantities.

lked up and down the streets of Portland, e principal streets only, but the narrow s and out-of-the-way places, and I no- read on any sign the word "liquors" or n," nor was there in any window on any any bottles or decanters of wine or other s, nor were there any beer or whiskey s, full or empty, to be seen on any pave-

I found out what corresponded in Port- s nearly as there could be any resemblance at is familiarly known as the "slum district" in other cities. From 9 o'clock until midnight I walked through the streets which had been named to me as most nearly deserving that appellation. I did not see any store or building which gave any outward indication of its being a place where liquors were sold. I did not meet a drunken person, and only one upon whom I discovered the odor of liquor, and he was a policeman. I was surprised at the loneliness and quiet of the streets, and concluded that the Portland people either spent their evenings at home, or went to bed early. A policeman kindly gave me the information that a theatre had opened that evening on Peak's Island, a few miles out in the harbor, and that a steamboat load of people had gone out there to attend the entertainment, and he said that the boat would be due on its return trip at 20 minutes after 11 o'clock. I concluded that this rendezvous in the Portland harbor was probably another Coney Island, and that the denizens of the district I had been visiting had gone out there to have a frolic, and so, taking a position in the shadow of an electric light, I stood waiting their return. As they came in and passed by me I could see every countenance distinctly. They were men, women and children. I looked at them with surprise, as I failed to discover any evidence that a single one of them had been drinking. There was no alcoholic odor on the breath of any of them. They were a quiet, orderly, respectable company, just such as any one would expect to meet coming home from a Methodist meeting. I took the liberty of asking an explanation of a gentleman who was walking alone, and he told me that neither love nor money would buy a drop of any alcoholic liquor on Peak's Island. He kindly told me what he might have supposed I did not know, that the island was a part of the territory of the prohibition State of Maine. Surely, I thought to myself, some of those people who so flippantly told me prohibition was a dead failure, were not in the habit of visiting Peak's Island.

The tramp which I made through the streets of Portland that night was made alone. I felt a sense of security which I would have felt in few other cities. I have been through what is known as the "slum districts" in my own native city of Philadelphia, and in New York, but I was always accompanied by one or more police officers. I have been in nearly all of our Atlantic cities, and in many in the West, but never in any city at the hours named, have I witnessed the same degree of order and decorum which I saw in Portland.

Notwithstanding these conditions which I have described I do not mean to give the impression that there is no liquor selling or drunkenness in Portland, quite otherwise. The omission of wine lists at the hotels, and the absence of liquors from hotel tables, and no advertising of liquors for sale, no saloon signboards on the streets are certainly so many outward indications of an observance of the law, an observance which in a very large degree removes temptation. To guests at the hotels, readers of newspapers, and to those who walk the streets of Portland, whether strangers or residents, the temptation is not as in other cities, constantly presented. It is certainly a much safer place for young men to live and grow up than in other places where the temptation is ever before them. But the sale and use of intoxicants in Portland, as in many other places in Maine, is carried on clandestinely under such conditions as are very unattractive. In the very hotel where I dined, as before described, I found in an out-of-the-way place in the basement an apartment which answered the purpose of a barroom. There was an unpainted pine counter, and a number of bottles displayed containing ginger ale, sarsaparilla, and other such drinks as are commonly called "soft" and there was a bartender, and either under the counter or in some other hiding place, or in a refrigerator there were stronger drinks which could be had when called for. There were no stools, nor chairs, nor tables in the room, no pictures on the walls, nor any of the ordinary paraphernalia of a barroom to induce any one to tarry longer than necessary. I was in this apartment several times, and usually found the bartender alone, and found him obligingly willing to be interviewed. He told me the public authorities knew perfectly well that liquors were being sold there, that the officers usually came there every six months and made them pay a fine of $100 and costs, and then so long as they kept certain city regulations not to sell liquors on Sunday or to minors, or drunkards, or were complained of by no one they were not molested until another six months came around. I found similar apartments under like conditions in some other hotels in Portland, and I found interior or back rooms in a number of fruit and grocery stores where liquors were for sale under very similar conditions, but these were not, however, the most reputable stores, and they were usually in out-of-the-way places, not likely to be found by strangers, and not likely to be frequented by citizens who had a care for their reputation.

I have been a not infrequent visitor in Portland in recent years, and what I have last witnessed may be taken as the prevailing conditions for a number of years past, but my familiarity with Portland extends far back of this recent period. Portland, its streets, its commerce, its wharves were familiar to me more than forty years ago. There were then liquor saloons on nearly all the business streets, and there were blocks of buildings on the streets near the wharves where liquor selling seemed to be the chief business. Jamaica rum was one of the principal commodities dealt in, as evidenced by the barrels which crowded the wharves. There were then some half a dozen breweries in Portland, and at least two distilleries. Where are these saloons now, and the barrels of Jamaica rum? What has become of the breweries and the distilleries? They are not there now. What caused their removal? If it was not the prohibitory law which closed the saloons and stopped the importation of rum and silenced the breweries and distilleries, what was it? Tell me, ye whose traffic has been destroyed, and who yet denounce the law as a failure. Tell me, ye professed friends of prohibition, who denounce the law as a failure because it doesn't work miracles, tell me, what has brought about this marvellous change?

It is said that the blessings which are nearest us and which are everywhere about us are those of which we take least note, and I am afraid it is so with many of the good people in Portland, and elsewhere in Maine, and I don't know but that some of them have short memories. Those who can remember far enough back have only to recall the circumstances of forty years ago, and compare them with the prevailing conditions of to-day.

I made a visit to Bangor, but found affairs there so similar to what I saw in Portland that it is not necessary to describe them, and there are other cities and towns, some of which I visited, and others of which I have reliable knowledge where the conditions are much the same, but in many of the smaller towns, and generally throughout the rural sections of the State where I have not only had the opportunity for personal observation, but opportunity also for collecting reliable information, I feel warranted in asserting that prohibition is in a good measure successful. In very many places drinking and drunkenness are unknown. Young people have grown up to manhood and womanhood without having known the sight or taste or the presence of intoxicating liquors, and I have been assured by men and women of mature years that they have never seen that sight to us so sadly common, a drunken person.

I have spoken of two classes of persons in Maine who denounce the prohibitory law as a failure; one class, those who do so from selfish motives, and demand the repeal of the law, but this is not a very formidable class. The cry of repeal has been many times raised but never made much headway. It is only a few years since one of the political parties of the State made repeal a plank of their platform, and on that plank they were able to elect less than half a dozen members in a House having a membership of more than one hundred, and the repeal scheme was a ignominous failure.

That prohibition is the settled policy of Maine is very generally admitted, and it would be suicidal on the part of any party to make its repeal an issue.

The other class is made up, as I have already stated, chiefly of prohibitionists. By this, I do not mean members of the prohibition party, but professed friends of prohibition without respect to any party affiliations. They condemn prohibition as a failure, because it does not everywhere stop the sale of liquor, close all the saloons, and make sobriety universal throughout the State. It seems to me that such are very unreasonable, as well as inconsistent and unwise. They don't condemn the law against stealing as a failure, although thieving may be committed in different parts of the State on every day in the year.

The worst foes of prohibition, those who are really doing the most mischief, are not those who openly denounce the law because they hate it and would have it repealed. Little do the professed prohibitionists think of the harm they are doing, unwittingly it may be, when they put themselves in the way of being quoted, as they are quoted throughout the country by the enemies of prohibition, who say, "Why, even the prohibitionists of Maine admit that prohibition is a failure."

There is no failure on the part of the law. It is everything that could be asked for to attain the end in view: the suppression of the drink traffic, and the punishment of those who are law-defiant. Many of those who are elected or appointed to administer the law are failures because they do not enforce it, and many of the prohibitionists themselves are failures also (I dislike to say it, but the truth must be told) because they do not give to the officers of the law the aid and support which as good citizens, it is their duty to give.

A case in point let me narrate. A woman in Portland, a widow, lived in a house which she owned, having a family of several children, among whom was a grown up daughter and two young sons just coming into manhood. A party purchased the adjoining property, opened a store, and in a back room he established a bar for the sale of liquors. The apartment where this illegal business was carried on was in full view of the windows of the woman's house. The woman was indignant at the scenes which were daily enacted before the eyes of her daughter and her sons, and she resolved, if possible, to have the nuisance suppressed. She was diffident about going to the public authorities, but resolved to lay the whole matter before a friend of hers, a prohibitionist of some prominence, and get him to intercede for her. She put the whole case before him; he assured her of his sympathy, how very greatly he regretted the unpleasant circumstances under which she was placed, but that the party who had purchased the property and of whom she complained, was one with whom he had business relations, and whom he would not like to offend, and that any interference on his part would be a loss to him in his own business; therefore he would have to be excused from doing anything for her. This man was a coward, the meanest kind of a coward. All his professed interest in the cause of prohibition was nothing to him when his own selfish interests lay in the other scale. I do not know how many such prohibitionists there may be in Maine. I would not like to think that there are many, but I must be candid, and the truth must be told, even if somebody is offended. I have great reason to believe from the testimony presented, that the cause of prohibition in Maine is greatly injured and its enforcement hindered and retarded by the apathy and indifference of many of its professed friends, and their unwillingness, as in the Portland case already recited, to do the simple duty which devolves upon every good citizen to aid to the extent of his ability in the enforcement of the law.

The people of Maine have upon their statute books the best laws enacted by any State for suppression of the drink traffic, and the encouragement and education of the people in habits of sobriety. In very few of the other States have the friends and advocates of temperance any such backing. The laws in many of the States serve the protection rather than the suppression of the traffic. Whatever advance is made along temperance lines elsewhere, is made against fearful odds, against a strongly entrenched and powerful foe. We do not mean to say that the people of Maine have no foe to encounter. The liquor traffic is everywhere a relentless, law-defiant and unscrupulous foe to the highest and best interests of the community, and the drinking passion will always and everywhere resist restrictive legislation, and be fruitful in expedients to avoid and evade it. But in the prohibitory law, and in the public sentiment of the people, which sustains it, the prohibitionists of Maine, and the whole people of Maine have everything to encourage and stimulate them, not only on account of the advance so far made, but because of the rare opportunities which they enjoy of keeping their State not simply abreast, but in harmony w the motto of the coat-of-arms of Maine (Dirij in the very fore-front of this great reform.

To the Members of the Three Monthly Me ings in the City of Philadelphia, 1805.

Dear Friends:—Our minds have been s rowfully affected under the consideration the many failures and bankruptcies which latter times have taken place among us, the wounding of the testimony of truth, reproach of our Christian profession, and ruin and distress of individuals and famil Of the causes which have led thereto we very fully disapprove, and declare our disu with; and as we seriously wish that more stances of this kind may be avoided, we th it right to warn and caution all against properly grasping after the things of world, and engaging in hazardous undertak out of the counsel and wisdom of truth, wh by they may be rendered incapable of b punctual to their promises and just in the ment of their debts.

Repeated and salutary advices have given, both publicly and in private, whic attended to, would have preserved many have fallen into great straits and difficulties

Many causes which might be enumer have contributed to produce these sorro effects; but there is one that has particul engaged our attention, to wit, The practic giving and taking promissory notes, called commodation paper, and endorsing them for another, and thus improperly becor sureties, sometimes even to a greater am than such parties are capable of paying. much better would it be, to be contented such trade and business as are within the r of our capitals; and never to enter into engagements or promises without provi funds of our own to comply with punctual

We are also engaged to caution every vidual against imprudently entering into securities with others; for by these pract many innocent wives and children have inevitably and unexpectedly involved in ruin and deplorable circumstances. We there earnestly desire Friends to keep strictl their guard, that none through any spe pretences of rendering acts of friendsh others with safety to themselves, may their own peace and reputation, and th curity of their families: in order hereunt recommend the salutary advice of the man to their special notice and regard: not thou one of them that strike hands, them that are sureties for debts: If thou nothing to pay, why should he take awa bed from under thee?"

Finally, dear Friends, we recommend attend carefully to the principle of grac truth in their own minds, which is sufficie preserve and keep us from falling; and to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbl ccount of a visit paid to the south of Ire-d in the summers of 1841 and 1842, by uel Capper of Bristol, accompanied in the ormance of it by Robert Charlton, Thomas le and John Cadbury.

e my going on business to Ireland in 35, in which journey I passed through of the towns in the province of Munster, the county of Wexford, I have had an hension that it would be required of me ne time, to visit these places again and d meetings with that part of the popula-hich, on account of its poor and degraded it is not easy to approach. This prospect s I apprehended so ripened, that in the of 1841 I thought it would be right dur-hat summer to go over, but the severe s and death of my son John prevented my taining the subject, as regarded its actual tion, until after his decease. He died on xth of Third Month, 1841 and was buried e fourteenth of the same.

the sixth of Fourth Month I laid this ect before the Monthly Meeting of Bristol, hat meeting after a time of solid delibera-n which many minds appeared to enter into the subject, directed a certificate prepared, which was brought in and is as 's: o Friends of the city of Cork and of some places of the south of Ireland.

r Friends:—Our dear friend Samuel Cap-as brought before us a concern which he lt for some years past, to pay a religious o the southern parts of Ireland, and par-kly to the city of Cork, chiefly with the f holding meetings among those who are embers of our religious Society.

subject has engaged our serious con-tion; and much unity and sympathy with ear friend, in this prospect of service, been expressed, we think it right to set liberty to proceed in it—he being a min-n unity with us.

s our desire that all his movements there-be ordered of the Lord, that he may be thened and preserved in the path of duty at a blessing may rest upon his labors. We would commend him to the guidance and protection of Israel's Shepherd and to your brotherly care and sympathy. Remaining with a salutation of love, your Friends.

Signed in and on behalf of Bristol Monthly Meeting held there fourth of Fifth Month 1841."

This certificate is signed by thirty-seven men and twenty-four women.

Some few days after the Monthly Meeting in the Fourth Month, William Woods of Limerick, was in Bristol, and as Friends had directed a certificate to be drawn up on my behalf, I thought it best to acquaint him with my views a little more particularly; he seemed to think it would be well to mention them to some Friends of the Meeting of Ministers and Elders of the Munster Quarterly Meeting, then about to be held at Clonmel.

I received a letter from William Harvey of Cork, dated fifteenth of Fourth Month, 1841, of which follows a copy, and to which on the twentieth I sent the subjoined answer:

"My dear Friend, Samuel Capper:—It was left with me by Friends in the station of Elders who met at our Quarterly Meeting held at Clonmel within a few days, to convey to thee something of their feelings on hearing that thou wast likely to be soon in this part of Ireland, in service of a peculiar kind, for which thou had obtained the certificate of thy Monthly Meeting only, and did not purpose laying thy concern before thy Quarterly Meeting, previously to entering on the work, which latter information brought Friends under some exercise as it did appear to them, that a concern such as thine was described to be, ought to obtain the fullest consideration which the good order of our Society provides for.

We fear that the omission of thy Quarterly Meeting's sanction would be unsatisfactory to many, and as the nature of thy concern, viz., holding public meetings in a tent, would be, we conceive, attended with both difficulty and danger in this land: would it not, in case of any serious disturbance arising out of the unruly dispositions of the people, be a comfortable reflection to thyself, that thou hadst not engaged in it, without the full concurrence and unity of thy friends both at home and abroad; these observations seemed due to thee and the cause, and they are offered in love for thy consideration. I remain affectionately thy friend,

William Harvey."

The answer.

Fourth Month 20th, 1841.

"My dear Friend, William Harvey:—Thy kind letter came to hand in due course and requires my acknowledgment of the care and solicitude of the Elders of Munster Quarterly Meeting, who have regarded my prospect in its true light, as a concern of deep responsibility and very arduous. I am not surprised that Friends unaccustomed to the peculiar service which I believe myself called to, should be somewhat startled at it, and it will certainly be my place to acquiesce in the decision of Friends should they think it best that I should not proceed. Personally I might be induced to feel that your doubts present an opportunity, which my inclination would be pleased to embrace, of withdrawing from a service by no means gratifying; at the same time I would offer a few remarks for the consideration of thyself and the kind Friends who have taken an interest on the subject. In contemplating this engagement in your nation, I could not do otherwise than ponder the points so strongly set forth in thy letter, viz., the risk of disturbance and personal danger to others as well as myself; but when these things have come discouragingly into view, it has been accompanied with a feeling that if we are desirous of being the servants of Christ, we must be willing to follow those requirings which are made manifest to us: though I have been tried with thoughts of this kind, yet I have been favored not to be uneasy about the issue; it may be, as has been much the case in this land, that even in the worst neighborhoods we have had often quiet satisfactory meetings; nor do I think that were I certain of much difficulty and danger attending, I dare on that account, abandon the engagement. I find that a Friend, Young Sturge, who will write, will be likely to advert to the inability I was under of applying to our last Quarterly Meeting, and I shall only add, that I am quite disposed to act in accordance with the judgment of Friends, but should be uneasy if the omission of this apprehended duty were to lie upon me. Desiring to be remembered in dear love to Friends in your city and such others as may remember me, I am thy affectionate friend, Samuel Capper."

God is Love.—"I don't see how God can be Love, and yet people suffer so," said a rebellious young learner. And the teacher answered with a story found in her lesson book on Job:

A kind captain once found his cabin boy clinging to the high rigging, trembling and pale, but unwilling to come down; he was afraid of the mate, he said.

But why?

"Because," answered the boy," "he took a knife and cut a piece of flesh out of a sailor's arm; then he took a red-hot iron and burnt it dreadfully."

"Was that all?"

"No: he killed Bruno and threw him overboard. He is a cruel man, and I am afraid of him."

"Now listen," said the captain; "Bruno went mad and bit the sailor; the mate saved his life by what he did to his arm. In order to save your life and mine, he killed Bruno and threw him overboard; now are you afraid of him?" And the boy became ashamed.

"Now," continued the teacher, "that is the way suffering looks to us when we cannot understand it; but come down from these trembling, miserable doubts, little sailor, and remember that 'the Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger and plenteous in mercy' and that 'our light afflictions, which are but for a moment, are working out for us a far exceeding and eternal weight of glory.'"—Christian Arbitrator.

Do you ask how to overcome? It is an open secret. "Ye have overcome, little children," the apostle said, "because greater is He that is in you, than he that is in the world." Receive into your heart the stronger than the strong man armed. Open your whole being to His indwelling. Let the nature of the living Christ rise up to the wrestle with Apollyon. It is not Christ without only, but within, who is the secret source of the overcoming life.—F. B. Meyer.

Job, an Appreciation.

It has been well remarked that were the Book of Job rightly understood, it would be seen to tower above every other poem, as the great pyramid of Egypt does above all other buildings. It is a work the splendor of which grows on the reader. Its greatness is not apparent at first, but the more it is studied the more wonderful it appears. When and by whom was it written? Who has the glory of having planted the grandest flower in the whole garden of literature? The question is of considerable interest. There is a talmudic tradition that Moses wrote the Book of Job during his sojourn in Midian. . . . .

And this view of its great antiquity—the view that its date is prior to the Exodus—is confirmed by the language. We need scarcely go to the original to see that we have here a very archaic work. There are probably two references to the destruction of the cities of the plain; there is not one to any incident at or during or later than the Exodus. One unexpected feature of the book is that the author, desiring to give the portrait of a good man, goes outside the chosen race and finds one amongst the people of the nations without—an ideal it is difficult to imagine being cherished by a Jew, especially by one of the post-exilic period, when the narrowest conceptions prevailed.

And what is most remarkable, and has not yet received the attention it deserves, the whole book is thoroughly Egyptian. Every animal mentioned belonged to Egypt; some, such as the hippopotamus and crocodile, especially so. The same fact is true of the vegetation. The natural history is not that of Assyria or Chaldea, but of the valley of the Nile; although the scene is laid in the country east of the Jordan. Recent discoveries in ancient Egyptian literature cast side-lights on many passages formerly obscure. The poem belongs to an age of books, but especially of rude inscriptions. The money is of patriarchal age. The musical instruments are those, and only those, found in Egyptian monuments. Still further, there are a number of lesser allusions which hieroglyphic literature illustrates, such as the evident sanctity of monogamy; the prominence given, in times of festivity, to the society of sisters; the formation of spirits under the waters; the reference to men having to be weighed in a balance, so frequent in the "Book of the Dead"; the breaking in of waters, sending streams on the fields, the waters drying up and passing away; and many others—of no evidence taken separately—but which indicate that the book in every part is leavened with ideas distinctly Egyptian. Were there no traditions of the author, were the question discussed purely on internal evidence, the conclusion would be forced upon any person acquainted with the literature of ancient Egypt that the Book of Job must have been written by one learned in the learning of the Egyptians.

Whilst founded on fact, the poetic character is very manifest. This sublime poem, for such it is, has been called the Melchisedek of literature. It commences with a vision of unseen interpenetrating the seen—not the least truthful portion of the book. This is not a dream of the poet, but a realization of the seer that in the near invisible mighty world of spirits beings are in contest for the souls of men. .

Returning to the scene, we find the wealthy and respected Job plunged into a series of troubles, and eventually smitten with a dire disease. In his sorrow, three old friends pay him a visit of condolence. Their names and dwelling-places are stated with unnecessary minuteness, unless they were actual men and not fictitious characters. Either the men were known at the time the book was written, or the descriptions are disingenuous and inartistic. Then the poetry commences, and continues with twenty-one speeches—three sevens. The friends came to comfort; they meant well, but Satan influenced and they but made matters worse. There was first seven days' silence. Then Job began with a curse on the day in which he was born. "Why could he not have stayed in the realm of unborn babes and been at rest with kings and counsellors of the earth who built for themselves pyramids?" . . . .

But it is just when most crushed, when from this brave soul comes the cry, "Have pity upon me, O ye my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me," that he gives utterance to the one universal faith of God's elect in every age:

"I know that my Redeemer liveth,
And that He shall stand up at the last upon the earth:
And after my skin hath been thus destroyed,
Yet apart from my flesh shall I see God:
Whom I shall see for myself,
And mine eyes shall behold, and not another."

Zophar does not venture on a third address, and Job is left master of the field, having borne down all his adversaries. The brook of human comfort has dried up, and like the bed of a mountain torrent, left nothing but hard and arid stones. These good men, completely silenced, had nothing more to say. A long monologue by Job follows, in which came visions of the past days of peace and prosperity. The twenty-ninth chapter has been admired in every age. The beautiful description of a good chief in primitive times has an indescribable charm:

"I delivered the poor that cried.
The fatherless also, that had none to help him.
The blessing of Him that was ready to perish came upon me:
And I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.
I put on righteousness, and it clothed me:
My justice was as a robe and a diadem.
I was eyes to the blind.
And feet was I to the lame.
I was father to the needy:
And the cause of Him that I knew not, I searched out."

This has been pointed out as showing a state of society of a later date. As a matter of fact, it is distinctly Egyptian. Amongst the recent discovery of Nile monuments is the epitaph of a chieftain of a date prior to Moses, who says: "Not a little child did I injure; not a widow did I oppress; not a herdsman did I ill-treat; there was no beggar in my day; no one starved in my time; and when the years of famine came, I ploughed all the land of the province to its northern and southern boundaries, feeding its inhabitants and providing their food. There was no starving person in it, and I made the widow to be as though she possessed a husband." Of another it is said: "He made no distinction between a stranger and those known to him. He was the father of the weak, the supporter of those who had no mother. Feared by the ill-doer, he protected the poor. He was the avenger of those whom a more powerful one had deprived of property. He was the husband of the widow, the refuge of the orphan." The expression of Job, "I was eyes to the blind, and feet w to the lame," almost seems taken from "Book of the Dead," which speaks of b "Bread to the hungry, water to the thi clothes to the naked, a refuge to him th in want." . . . .

One important point should not be o looked. To the Jew the horse was forbi in battle. The war horse was a detesta With the Egyptian it was the chief reliand war. Naturally a poet of Egyptian cul would select the creature as a noble speci of the Divine handiwork; no Jew, especial the post-exilic age, would dream of giving an illustration as that which came from mouth of God. The hippopotamus and cr dile were creatures of the Nile. Job medit upon these. Not by a thought of Divine and pardoning grace, but of irresistible n he is brought to self-distrust. Then lying at the feet of God in dust and ashes he rep with the repentance of self-abhorrence, the great God becomes his friend. The Eg tian ideal of a good old age, as mentione several places, was 120 years, Job lived and died full of days.

The composition of the Book of Jo marked by unusual strength. It is a cat of vigorous clear-cut sentences, coming fo most part in pairs or parallelisms. The rh is of thought, not of words. There is ne sign of weariness. When any expressio unusual importance is to be made it is ac panied by some lengthy piece of descri well sustained. For instance, when El wishes to emphasize the question "Shall m man be more just than God?" he introd with vivid description an apparition who it. In another place, the difficulty of fi wisdom is introduced by a long well-sust account of mining operations. The cont tion of this work to the current coin o conversation to-day is remarkable. It w be difficult to find another poem of equal le to which we owe so much. Such expres as "Where the wicked cease from trou and the weary are at rest," or "Coming t grave like a shock of corn fully ripe," or moon walking in brightness," or "He that clean hands groweth stronger and stron and at least forty others which coul brought out, are unalloyed gold. It is a vincing evidence of its poetic excellence, coming from the uttermost parts of the e and the uttermost ages of time, this should have laid so strong a hold on th pressions of our day. It is the fullest sublimest view of natural theology tha ever appeared. As such it is most val breathing as it does in every sentence the of a fuller revelation of God to meet the of suffering sinning men. . . . .

As we read we see the large open tent hillside on the east of Jordan. There is tall, powerfully built, with noble counte and bushy black locks. He is crouchi the ground in agony, for some strange di has covered him with boils. IF it costs something to be a Christian, it costs more to be a sinner.

Items Concerning the Society.

John G. Lane, who died last Fifth Month, a resident of Philadelphia, and interested attender of our meetings, but a member of New York Yearly Meeting, left one hundred thousand dollars to that Yearly Meeting for educational purposes.

On Fifth day of last week, when the city was full of visitors to the reunion of veterans of the Civil War, a considerable number of strangers attended the Friends' Meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets. On the afternoon of that day and on Sixth day about one thousand it was thought visited the grounds attached to the Meeting-house.

The Venlig Budbringer is a periodical published quarterly by the Friends in Denmark and Norway. The Society has about one hundred and sixty members in these countries, who are struggling to keep up their meetings in the face of great discouragements, as military conscription makes adherence to peace principles a great hardship. — Australian Friend.

Our friend Zebedee Haines has had religious service within the limits of Muncy Monthly Meeting. Both he and Cyrus W. Harvey attended Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting, after which C. W. Harvey had three public meetings within its limits. Since his return from Canada and New England, he has been largely engaged in religious service within the limits of different Quarterly Meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The Quinquennial Conference, in which the larger number of American Yearly Meetings were represented, appointed a committee to present to the Yearly Meetings a draft of a uniform Discipline for them all. The sub-committee engaged in preparing the proposed Discipline has been expecting to have it ready in time to lay it before Indiana Yearly Meeting in the present month. But the work appears to need such further careful consideration, that they have abandoned the idea of having it finished in time for the Yearly Meetings which come this autumn.

"D. D.," AND "REV."—[The following letter from a Baptist minister to the Raleigh Post so thoroughly accords with Friends' views on the subject of unscriptural titles that we reprint it here. And let us hope that while so many in other churches are coming to see the folly of "Rev.," "D. D." etc., that Friends will curb their slackness in the use of these terms.—Editor of North Carolina Friend.]

For the past few years Wade Forest College has well nigh quit putting D. D. to preachers' names. Many people of common sense thought this a tendency in the right direction. It was fondly hoped by many that this college would set the example of entirely quitting this foolish practice. D. D. means a doctor, or teacher of divinity. Divinity means the divine power, justice, goodness and mercy of God the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Every God-called preacher and every faithful Sabbath School teacher, who teaches these Divine attributes of the triune God is a teacher of divinity. Therefore it is making a foolish, unnecessary, unscriptural and invidious distinction to single out a few and call them teachers of divinity. . . Many felt sad when they saw that Wade Forest College had marred [a beloved brother's] name by putting D. D. to it. I am sure that the brother does not believe in such a title and that he did not want it.

The Roman Catholics have put "St." for saint to the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. "St." ought to be left out of our Bibles, and ought never to be called. But "D. D." has no more Scriptural authority than "St." It is ridiculous even to think of saying Dr. Jesus, Dr. Matthew, Dr. John, Dr. Paul.

It would have greatly belittled Spurgeon to have called him Dr. Spurgeon. He repudiated all such titles as unscriptural. Rev. for reverend is a Roman Catholic title, and ought to be repudiated by all who take the Bible as their guide. Why cannot Christian ministers be satisfied with scripture titles — Elder, Overseer, Bishop, Evangelist? Elder J. B. Gambrel, of Texas, than whom there lives no better or more useful man, was given some years ago the title of D. D. He does not believe in it. He was troubled because it was conferred on him.

With all of what little influence I have, I want to stand unyieldingly against all unscriptural titles, teachings and institutions, and firmly for the simplicity and purity of Bible truth.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—James B. Eustis, Ambassador to France during the second Cleveland administration, died at his summer home at Newport, Rhode Island, on the 9th inst. He was at one time United States Senator from Louisiana.

The widow of the late United States Senator Bruce, has accepted the position of Woman Principal of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, at Tuskegee, Ala. Senator Bruce was the only negro who served a full term in the United States Senate and was the first negro Register of the United States Treasury. His widow is a woman of great intelligence and refinement, and is deeply interested in the cause of industrial education.

The amount of gold certificates withdrawn from the Treasury to the 5th inst. in exchange for gold coin is $41,665,050. The amount of net gold in the Treasury continues to increase, and on the 4th with $249,246,254, exceeded all previous records.

Last year 5,200,000 pounds of aluminum, valued at $1,716,000, were produced in the United States. The value per pound was therefore 33 cents. In 1888, 19,000 pounds of that metal were produced, valued at nearly $3.33 a pound.

A despatch from Key West, Fla., of the 11th instant, says: "The total number of yellow fever cases up to date is 189; reported in the past twenty-four hours, 12. The physicians have failed to make report to-night. No deaths have occurred in the past twenty-four hours."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "According to the report recently published by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the railroads of the country, which are extremely sensitive to industrial conditions, are feeling to a remarkable extent the wave of prosperity that is sweeping over the United States. In mileage, in equipment, in receipts, in number of passengers carried, in amount of freight hauled and in financial conditions the last year showed an improvement as remarkable as it is gratifying. In the matter of public service the figures show a proportionate increase. The aggregate number of passengers carried during the year was 501,666,681, being an increase over the previous year of 11,621,483. The number of passengers carried one mile during the year was 13,379,930,004, an increase of 1,122,990,357 compared with the previous year. The greater density of passenger traffic is shown by the fact that in 1898 the number of passengers carried one mile for each mile of line was 72,462, and only 66,874 in the previous year. The number of tons of freight carried during the year was 879,006,307, a growth of 137,300,361. The number of tons of freight carried one mile was 114,077,576,905, which, compared with the previous year, shows the immense increase of 18,838,554,080 tons. The number of tons of freight carried one mile for each mile of line was 617,810, which was 98,731 tons greater than the corresponding item for the previous year. The gross earnings of the railways, covering an operated mileage of 184,648, were $1,247,325,621, being greater by $125,235,848, than during the preceding fiscal year. Forty-five roads were taken out of receivers' hands."

In Massachusetts more money is invested in cotton mills than in any other manufacturing industry, but the making of boots and shoes yields the most valuable product.

Kansas reports an increase of 10.82 per cent. in cattle for the year, making the sum total, milch cows included, of 2,886,068 head. The greatest gain was in Barber County, 22,207, but these are mostly for beef, only 3,263 of the 65,806 credited to the county being cows. The total number of milch cows is 684,182, Dickinson County having the lead with 14,948. The gain will be greater for the year to come, as the immense stock of corn and forage must give a surplus to be either fed at home or burned.

Negotiations are progressing at Vancouver, British Columbia, by which New York capitalists will acquire every salmon cannery property in British Columbia. Greenerymen agree to take half cash and half stock of McGovern & Co., which firm is now forming a big combine in New York. There are sixty-eight canneries all told, valued at about $40,000 each.

The total receipts from all sources at the three principal ports in the Philippines during Eighth Month were $667,618, exceeding those for Seventh Month by $135,618.

The new Voice and Chicago Lever says: "The liquor traffic is for territorial expansion. Two thousand saloons have been opened in Cuba since the war. Long trains of Milwaukee beer, New England rum and Kentucky whiskey have been moving toward the Philippines, to help Mauser rifles and gatling guns civilize the heathen."

A writer in the American Lumberman suggests that Southern red gum be used in the manufacture of certain kinds of furniture and for finishing interiors. The general superiority of oak is admitted by him, but he says: "With almost a famine staring consumers in the face, something must be found to fill the void. The Mississippi Delta is crowded with tall and symmetrical red gum trees. Along the streams of Southern Missouri, Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississipi, Louisiana and North and South Carolinas they constitute the most numerous and stateliest denizens of the woods. Red gum is almost as susceptible to the saw and plane as white pine, is more easily worked and dried than oak, while its weight places it in the same class as white ash, walnut and cherry. The wonder is that dealers have been so slow in realizing the usefulness of a wood so abundant and so easily manipulated."

During last week the worst forest fires in the history of Northern Wyoming raged in the mountains between North and South Forks of Tongue River, west of Sheridan. Four townships were burned over and the town of Rockwood was wiped out.

There were 405 deaths in this city last week, which is 69 more than the previous week and 132 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 104 were children under one year of age; 230 were males and 175 females: 59 died of consumption; 34 of marasmus; 33 of heart diseases; 29 of cholera infantum; 17 of apoplexy; 17 of pneumonia; 16 of inanition; 15 of diphtheria; 14 from casualties; 12 of convulsions; 11 of nephritis; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and 6 from septicæmia.

FOREIGN.—The British Empire has a population of 406,000,000 people; of this number 40,405,000 are in Europe, 308,300,000 in Asia, 45,000,000 in Africa, including Egypt; 7,100,000 in American colonies and 5,500,000 in Oceanica.

The trial of Captain Dreyfus at Rennes in France, has resulted in his conviction for treason, and a sentence of ten years imprisonment in France. The Judges stood five for conviction and two for acquittal. They stated there were "extenuating circumstances;" a remarkable admission, in view of the crime of treason being regarded as one of the highest known to the law. Many of the witnesses against Dreyfus, were perjurers or guilty of other crimes; while important witnesses for the defense were not permitted to give testimony bearing on the case. The action of the Judges is severely commented upon by the press of Europe and America. The success of the Paris Exposition is likely to be greatly impaired as a result of the verdict.

The report of the British Consul at Manila on the state of trade there, says: "There is abundant evidence that when peace and a settled form of government are well established, the future prosperity of the Filipinos will far exceed the past."

The reading rooms in the Whitechapel district of London have been visited by 1,750,000 readers in two years, and their numbers are rapidly growing.

A despatch dated the 10th inst., from Brigus, N. F., says: "The Peary-Harmsworth steamer Windward, Captain John Bartlett, from Etah, North Greenland, Eighth Month 26th, arrived here, reporting all well on board. She will be followed in a week by the PearyArctic Club's steamer Diana, Captain Samuel W. Bartlett, also from Etah. The Windward reports that all on board the Diana were well at the time the vessels separated. Lieutenant Peary and the sledge parties were in the field almost continuously from Tenth Month 1898, to Eighth Month of this year, and have effected an extraordinary amount of important work, not only bearing on the future of his own expedition, but adding much to the geographical knowledge of the coast line and the interior of Ellesmere Land, the southern portion of Grinnell Land. His sledging journeys aggregate more than 1000 miles, not including several trips repeated over portions of the track. Lieutenant Peary found Fort Conger exactly as Greely left it. The table was standing from the last meal, and all the other appointments had remained undisturbed for sixteen years. The buildings were in fair condition, though some of them would not be serviceable much longer. He took possession of all the property, real and personal, in the name of the United States Government, and posted notices to that effect. A considerable quantity of provisions was also found and protected for further emergency. Four tons of provisions, two at Conger and the others distributed between Cape Sabine, Dunville, Louis Napoleon, Frazer and other points not more than fifty miles apart, have been deposited, and both natives and whites engaged in work have been made so familiar with the route and caches that all risk to life and limb along this path is practically ended. A boat is also cached at Cape Louis Napoleon. Ellesmere Land was found practically ice free and to contain much game. The water to the west of the coast, as far as could be seen, was also comparatively clear of ice."

The Pasteur Institute Commission, which recently arrived at Bombay to study the epidemic, asserts that it is the genuine Indian plague. The Commissioners have begun treating patients with the Pasteur serum, and protest against the inefficiency of the sanitary cordon.

Germany manufactures 70 per cent. of the world's production of coal tar colors.

The distress in Bessarabia in consequence of the failure of the harvest is very great. Farmers are unable to feed their horses and are giving them away for a few copecs or allowing them to die. The Red Cross Society is deavoring to help the starving people, but through la funds is able to accomplish but little.

A Swedish officer named Kuylenstjerne, who is at ent travelling in China, reports that the Manchurian way cannot be completed under five years, partly be all the wood has to be imported from America, and because most of the 12,000 Chinese laborers who had engaged went home again, being dissatisfied with the t ment they received at the hands of the Russians, an able to endure the cold winter.

ECENT VISIT TO THE DUKHOBORS IN MANITOBA.

n different sources information has reach- that our Friends, Eliza H. Varney and Gidley, after their arrival at Yorkton, ded to visit the Dukhobortsi in their s or settlements. After leaving York-ey proceeded to Fort Pelly on the way it is called the North Colony. A covered rance with a good team was provided for V. by a Friend with whom she made her n Yorkton, a member of her Yearly Meet-ob S. Gidley had in his team a tent with ients, furnished by a government official, sides the driver Ignace Alamanoffsky a n, was with him, (who had been impris-everal times in Russia for preaching the and came to Winnipeg about twelve go, and has found employment as an in-er.) A Russian Jew and a Frenchman with river, had a third conveyance. They ar-t Jacob Wurtz's and dined and from thence ded on to the East camp, on White Sand where they took supper and had a religious unity. It was the judgment of most of mpany to remain over night, but the Jew renchman were impatient to go on to Fort Pelly, and one of the drivers believing that the young man who was their driver could not manage to cross the Assinaboine River alone, it was decided to proceed, but before starting the Jew and his companion who had objected to the religious opportunity at the settlement, apologized, and said it was good for them to be there.

On arriving at the ferry about half after ten o'clock in the evening they found the scow was in the middle of the river; one of the drivers went hand over hand along the ferry rope to the scow, but found it fast on the rock so that he could not extricate it. The party then travelled about half a mile down the river to a ford, where the horses to the tent wagon stopped in the middle of the stream; after various devices for extricating the wagon the driver got out into the water nearly waist deep and attached a rope to one of the other wagons, (they having got over in safety) he next attached it to the one in the river. The rope, however, snapped twice, and it was with some difficulty the ends were found and fastened together again, but at last the wagon was drawn to the water's edge, so that the other passengers who had been held for over an hour in the river could alight. Here the horses were changed and the wagon was pulled up the bank, and when all were again loaded up they proceeded to Fort Pelly, reaching there about midnight; but not getting to the most suitable lodging place had an uncomfortable time; still they got their clothes dried and escaped taking cold.

E. H. V. remarks that she felt perfectly calm while crossing the river although the water was pouring over the bottom of the carriage.

The camps, with little exception, on Swan River, Assinaboine and White Sand River were visited before returning to Yorkton. They spent two nights with a family of the name of McDonald, driving to different camps around that particular point. They had several religious opportunities with the members of this family, and others who seemed to prize the privilege of being with them, which were tendering seasons; in one of them the Russian interpreter offered a prayer in his own language, which was described as being attended with a right feeling. Several of the McDonald family went seven or eight miles to a meeting among the Dukhobors.

Under date of Eighth Month 11th, Job S. Gidley writes: Eliza H. Varney and I with our company arrived in Yorkton last night. We visited nearly all the camps on the many creeks and rivers between here and Thunder Hill, and were gladly welcomed by all the Dukhobors. It is wonderful to see how much this people have accomplished. The different villages have cut and stacked quite a large amount of hay, the largest amount in any one village was estimated at two hundred tons. I fear the potato crop will be very small, on account of the late planting, and the early frost, that has cut them pretty hard in places already.

I felt that E. H. V. was greatly favored in her supplication and testimony in every village visited. The expressions of the Dukhobors in the different villages were very similar, and in substance were: "We thank God that He has put it into your hearts to leave your homes and all you hold dear to visit and encourage us by the words you have spoken, and we believe what you have said, and we wish you to tell your friends that we are glad to have people of God to visit us as you have done."

Our ten days journey in the wilderness has been a remarkable one in many respects, and will be remembered I trust with thankful hearts by all of our company as well as by the visited.

Eighth Month 18th, E. H. V. writes: "We visited both colonies and held thirty meetings among them after the manner of Friends, much more so than we at first thought possible, and they have mostly proved very favored seasons." They, however, met with considerable sickness, many times they were affected to tears at the sense of the condition of the settlers, and it appears from several accounts received that the spirit of supplication was granted in an extraordinary degree, which, with the testimonies, were not only well received, but heartfelt expressions of gratitude were heard for these favors, as also for the distribution that was made amongst them of material aid. One settlement is described as being especially in want, where the arrival had been too late for any crops except hay, which they were sometimes wronged out of by squatters after they had cut it, and in one place after they had stacked it. In another place their fishing net had been taken, under the pretence that their net had not the lawful meshes.

The conditions in places, especially where scurvy and malaria have appeared, is pitiable, and it is plain that much help will yet be needed to afford subsistance for months to come.

Steps were taken for the furnishing of milk and the speedy distribution of fifty bushels of beans, split peas and barley.

A second journey was taken from Yorkton which, including the first, involved fifteen days among the Dukhobors, and the attendance of thirty-eight villages out of the forty-two; on one of these occasions the interpreter was so touched that he seemed unable to proceed for the welling up of tears, and what seemed most remarkable to him was that no two prayers on the route were alike.

In another letter E. H. V. writes: "One poor woman in one of the villages said she was thinking God had forgotten them, and that the people of the country did not love them or they would come and see them. And now to think God had sent his servants to comfort and cheer them, it was the Lord's doings, and they were bowed in thankfulness to God in thus remembering them. We parted in much love; they took our baggage across the river, and then took us over on the raft one at a time, when they sang farewell as we left them, many of them wiping their eyes. We then proceeded seven miles to the next village where they had good log houses well finished, and everything clean and comfortable. Not only their earthen floors, but their door yards were perfectly clean; they had heard of our coming, and were waiting on the hill-side for us, and as we drew near sang us a welcome which was sweet, low and melodious. We have had much to be thankful for day by day. Never had we experienced deeper peace or more holy covering over our spirits than on this journey. I slept that night in one of their houses all curtained off, on a first class bed, made up of some of their pillows, very different from the night before. Such kindness I never experienced in all my life in the same length of time. It truly made what otherwise would have been hard things, easy.

We then went about seven miles without a trail to the next camp, where having been delayed in the morning we camped and had our dinner, the Dukhobors helping what they could. After dinner it was decided for me not to attempt to cross the Swan River, but to sit on one bank and the Dukhobors on the opposite, as both banks were steep and dangerous, and the raft poor. When I went to the top of the bank I felt so much for them I said I must go across, accordingly they put some pieces of plank on the raft, and although at this point the stream was quite rapid yet I got safely over, and the women nearly carried me up the bank; then we had our meeting."

The foregoing are some of the experiences of the pioneering of our friends, both of whom expressed themselves as being well satisfied with undertaking the journey, one of them saying, "It was the crowning visit of my life."

Job S. Gidley's Account.

Seventh Month 27th, 1899.—About seven o'clock in the morning we reached the beautiful city of Winnipeg, the metropolis of Manitoba.

After taking a respite for an hour or two we proceeded to the immigration building where we had a very pleasant interview with Wm. F. McCreary, to whom we had a letter of introduction from James A. Smart, Deputy Minister of the Interior. Wm. F. McCreary being the head of the department of immigration at Winnipeg, seems to be the right man in the right place.

He showed us every kindness in the furtherance of our plans to visit the Dukhobors in and about Yorkton, two or three hundred miles towards the northwest of Winnipeg.

At Winnipeg we formed the acquaintance of Rose Osborne, who seemed to be greatly interested in the Dukhobors. She told us that she had a class of Dukhobor children at Winnipeg last winter, and found them very easy to learn the English language. She visited the general hospital with us in the afternoon where there were several sick ones.

We made arrangements to visit the Dukhobors who were at East Selkirk on the 28th, Rose Osborne going with us: Leaving Winnipeg in the morning and returning in the afternoon. We found nearly two thousand Dukhobors at this place anxiously waiting for the time to come when they could go on to the land set apart for them. On our arrival at East Selkirk a novel sight met our eyes, for a hundred or more Dukhobor women and children were in, and on the banks of a small stream, all busy doing their washing. The young people were tending the fires to keep the water hot. After watching the people at their laundering for a time, we walked slowly through the woods (people of the N. W. Territory would call it brush) for a half mile or more, when we came to the Round House; the headquarters for the Dukhobors while in East Selkirk.

Here we found great activity among all of the shut-ins. Some were making tents, the first thing needed for protection in pioneer life. Others cutting and making garments. A few were knitting stockings and mending.

Some of the men were making harness, still others were making wooden spoons, etc., etc. The cooks were busily engaged in baking bread in ovens which the men had made out doors in the side of a little mound or hill not far from the tent and Round House. There was quite a number of these ovens. Other women were making their soups, in kettles hung over an open fire.

There was a meeting for worship held in the tent during the forenoon, which was a season of Divine favor.

We were told that funds were lacking to procure milk and eggs for the sick ones and the children, whereupon twenty dollars were left them for that purpose.

We took dinner with the caretakers. While we were eating, the Dukhobors in the main hall and adjoining the room in which we were, sung or chanted their psalms. When we had finished our repast and had gone out to the front of the building we were kindly greeted by about two hundred little Dukhobor boys and girls. As we passed through the door out into the sunlight they, all in perfect order, bowed their heads to the earth in recognition of what had been done for them.

Just before leaving East Selkirk in the afternoon there was another meeting held for religious worship in the Round House, where there must have been a thousand or more Dukhobors in attendance, who listened very attentively to what was offered in testimony and in supplication. This was also a favored season, a time when the tears did flow. Before we left them, one man who was fifty-six years of age, tried to tell me something, I asked the interpreter what he wanted. "He said that he wanted to talk English just as you do." I had one primer with me, and gave him a little instruction before we parted. He was eager to learn. Some others wanted to know if books could not be obtained with Russian on one page and English on the opposite page so that they could learn English without a teacher? Second hand primers and first readers even in English alone, would be very helpful to the children, who have little or no reading of any kind. On reaching home I found the following letter descriptive of this visit.

SELKIRK, Aug. 10th.

Seventh Month 29th.—We left Win for Yorkton and had a pleasant journey, a day was fine and the train was a slow which gave us a better opportunity of ge an observation of the "Garden of the W (so called by our brothers and sisters ov line). Some parts of Manitoba may w called a fertile garden, judging from the fields of grain growing luxuriantly on side of the railroad.

From a casual glance of the countr might judge Portage la Prairie to be the of the wheat growing belt.

After a favored season of silent w Eliza H. Varney appeared in supplicat the Throne of Grace, followed by testim which, being interpreted, seemed like see ing upon good ground, judging from th ner in which it was received.

For "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to Minnesota.

A correspondent who has lately made a trip by way of the Great Lakes from Buffalo to Duluth, and thence into the western part of Minnesota, has allowed us to extract from an interesting account of his journey as follows:

The harbor of Buffalo presented a busy scene as the steamers passed to and fro with the puffing little tugs industriously keeping them in line in the well sheltered but narrow water way. The queer grain elevators brought to mind the wheat fields of the northwest which we were so soon to be among. A smooth night's run on Lake Erie in the elegant steamship North West brought us to Cleveland in the morning by breakfast. We were interested in noticing the bid Cleveland is making for the lake commerce by the construction of a sea wall; thus creating an artificial safe harbor from the lake storms. Its position seems distinctively favorable as a coaling station for the lake steamers, and here our great steamship, the North West filled its three capacious bunkers. The operation was quickly performed by simply opening the gates to three great funnels leading from a coal elevator. I was interested in observing a result of the ingenuity of man in labor saving contrivance as exhibited in an adjacent dock. A barge was to be loaded with coal; a car (probably twenty-five tons capacity) was lifted with a section of the track to a height of about twenty feet and then turned over on its side, dumping the contents into a wide shute leading down into the barge. The operation was directed by one man, and was accomplished in little more time than it takes to tell of it, and was done as deftly as one would empty the contents of a coal scuttle. Continuing our voyage, the lake still very smooth before nightfall we had passed up the Detroit River to Detroit, Michigan's great mart, with its population of three hundred thousand souls. Beyond Detroit variety was given to our journey while passing through the St. Clair River; the banks of which upon the Michigan side are studded with cottage and other buildings erected upon piles, a place of summer resort, presumably for the Detroitians. As night was now upon us this illuminated miniature Venice appeared very attractive.

By the following evening we had passed over the waters of Lake Huron, which also were very placid; had stopped at prettily situated Mackinac, an island summer resort, and threaded through the numerous beautiful islands of the St. Mary River and had reached Sault St. Marie, commonly called the "Soo." Here it is needful to ascend twenty feet to the level of Lake Superior; the waters of the St. Mary's River making the descent by rapids. The locks are said to be the largest in the world, but the length was none too great for our mammoth steamship which stretched almost from gate to gate. Statistics show that the annual tonnage of the "Soo" Canal is twice as much as that of the great Suez Canal. Night having overtaken us, the search-light of the North West was brought into requisition, apparently for the entertainment of the passengers while the lock was being passed. The town, the canal, and the rapids were thus in turn beautifully lighted up. The following morning found us bounding across the bosom of Lake Superior, the largest body of fresh water in the world. The smooth sailing for the last two days was at an end. We were driving at the rate of probably twenty miles an hour; (the ship's speed is rated at twenty-two miles per hour) right into the eye of a strong northwest wind. Upon turning out of our berths we found the motion to be considerable and visions of sea sickness began to flit over our minds. We managed to dress and then to take breakfast without becoming "unsettled," and as the day wore away and we came more under the north shore of the lake, the motion grew less, and we were thankful to escape with a good record as sailors.

Lake Erie and Huron were mist laden as we passed over them, and their shores often could not be described, but the strong northwester that was blowing upon Lake Superior gave a beautifully clear atmosphere, so that, while the southern shore was almost continually in sight, partly because of the proximity of the ship's course, the northern outline also was traceable most of the day, and as we approached the western end of the lake its greater elevation gave it a bold outline.

We noticed that for a considerable time before Duluth was reached our ship clung closely to the northern shore: our supposition was to secure greater depth of water, as bluff shores are usually accompanied by adjacent deep water. Kind friends had warned us to make provision for cold weather upon Lake Superior, and we are now prepared to add our testimony to its constancy as a cool summer resort, indeed with the high wind it was hard to find a place upon deck where one could keep comfortably warm though it was the twenty-first of the Eighth Month. The low temperature is in measure at least accounted for by the great depth of the lake, about one thousand feet, so that as we were informed, the temperature of the water changes but a few degrees throughout the year. As we approached the end of our water journey, the sun set in great splendor upon the elevated northwesterly bank of the lake, and just as it disappeared in the west, the full round moon emerged as it were from the waters of the lake to the east: a scene of beauty long to be remembered.

Our tour of the Great Lakes of over a thousand miles in length was at an end, and we entered by a narrow passage way into the wonderful harbor of Duluth, still keeping close under the north shore. There was no need of sea wall, a kind Providence has formed an ideal harbor by casting an arm of land from the southern shore almost to the northern giving a protected water way within that would float a thousand ships. Thus situated at the head of the lake navigation, and a natural railroad centre for the northwest, it is no wonder that Duluth is growing by leaps and bounds. While the railroad tracks, the grain elevators, and other business enterprises are covering the flats to the west and south of the head of the lake, the residence portion of the city is extending avenue by avenue, up the abrupt shore slope to the north and east, so that the weary merchants may sit at eventide and overlook from their elevated sites the beautiful lake that affords them not only beauty but wealth. We were pained to note however, that here as elsewhere, "only man was vile," for in the store portion of the city, it seemed as though every other door was a liquor saloon. Here doubtless the poor sailors of the lakes in large measure give up their hard earned money to enrich a vampire brood, and in return receive only pauperism and wretchedness.

The eye accustomed to our Atlantic coast is impressed with the almost entire absence of sailing crafts, large or small, upon the Great Lakes. Steam evidently is better adapted for the carrying trade, and as to fisheries, there seem to be none.

Our trip from Duluth to St. Paul was without especial incident; most of the journey was through a most uninviting country. At Minneapolis the St. Anthony Falls of the Mississippi River form a water power of fifty thousand to one hundred thousand horse power. The tracks of the Great Northern Railway by which we were travelling pass right over the site, giving an excellent view of the adapted fall. The grain elevators are the conspicuous objects on every hand, both at Minneapolis and at St. Paul; the names upon them indicating numerous ownerships. To understand how the immense capacity of the elevators of Buffalo, Duluth and St. Paul can be taxed to the utmost at times one needs but to see the great wheat fields of the west.

Our coming to Minnesota is for the dryness of the climate and thus far there seems reason for satisfaction upon this account. There had been almost daily rainfall for a week before our arrival in Minnesota, said to be unusual for this season of the year. Yesterday, however, was a most beautifully clear day and we heartily enjoyed it in our no-top wagon ride of nearly thirty miles from Fergus Falls.

While the sun was hot the horses seemed hardly to lay a hair in the long trip. Our road lay through an undulating country, very winding to avoid the grade of the hills; wheat fields on every side, interspersed with stretches of unbroken woodland of only moderate growth. The timber was of oak, basswood and poplar, but not so heavy as we have in the East. The reason assigned for the relative smallness of the timber, (few trees exceeded two feet in trunk diameter) was that up to fifty years ago when the Indians were in possession of the lands they burned them off annually to foster the growth of the grass for the buffalo, with them doubtless, a principle source of support. There are however in Minnesota the two descriptions of land, the wooded and the prairie land, and we passed through some of each in our morning's ride. Numerous lakes are a marked feature in the Minnesota landscape, and several of them lay along our course, which were very beautiful as they sparkled in the bright sunlight. All the way from St. Paul to our destination, about two hundred miles, wheat seemed everywhere to abound, and probably nine-tenths of the cultivated land was in wheat, and the country was for the most part under cultivation. The reaping was finished and about half the harvest was in shock, and the other portion had been gotten into stack. Yesterday the farmers were very busy with their stacking as one or two days of dry weather after the successive rains enabled them to proceed therewith. Our livery man said the stacking of the grain was a recent development in the agricultural methods of the farmers of the State, the practice having come in vogue within five years; formerly it was allowed to stand in shock until threshed. We observed a few fields that indicated their owners were of the unprogressive kind who think the old ways good enough. The fields varied in size from small patches to probably fifty acres and upwards. Minnesota is not a ranch state, the farms usually are from three to four hundred acres down to seventy-five acres in extent. Up in this region the Norwegians and Swedes are quite a factor in the farming community. Our driver spoke of them as good and prosperous citizens. As we met them on the road the Scandanavian features and complexion were quite marked.

Our informant stated that improved farms can be had here at twenty to twenty-five dollars per acre, and that there has been considerable activity in farm real estate during the past year, farmers selling out in Illinois and Wisconsin and purchasing these cheaper farms in Minnesota. When we consider the cheapness of transportation, is it any wonder that we Eastern farmers and farm holders are crowded to the wall in the production of wheat, with land at fifty to one hundred dollars per acre? Wheat is now bringing sixty cents per bushel here and I suppose it is hardly worth seventy cents in New Jersey. One feature of cheap production was often witnessed as we rode along, that of the women working in the fields side by side with the men. We were interested in noting the stackers stood upright using forks. While we saw some good stacks, as a rule they were not so well put up as we see in the East; some I thought would take water. Our driver excused them by commenting that stacking was comparatively new in this country and in any event they would not have to stand a great while.

Any spring wheat is sown, winter wheat is considered softer and does not sell as well. The farmers are already beginning to plow the stubble for next spring's planting. The ground is again mellowed with cultivators just before the sowing, which is done about the Fifth Month. Our informant stated that no commercial fertilizers are used, and it was evident that most of the land received nothing from the barn yard. The soil is a black loam and looks as though it might stand this exhaustive cropping for some years yet to come. We noted however, as we sped along in the train a number of large herds of cows within the first hundred miles out from St. Paul, and our driver stated that Minnesota stood third in dairy products among the states of the Union. We doubt not that the dairying will gradually spread over the State and recoup the soil.

HURRIED AND FLURRIED.—A great portion of our work in this world is marred by hurry and flurry. Our minds do not work easily when fretted and chafed; and we need the leisure of self-possession in order to accomplish our best work. If we could only grasp the great thoughts of eternity, and understand that the everlasting future is before us, and at our disposal; if we could see the grand repose of Him who "fainteth not, neither is weary," who "is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness," and yet who, through the march of countless ages, pursues his steady course, and brings to pass his mighty purposes; and if we could catch something of this spirit and this composure, we should learn the meaning of those words, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation; he that lieveth shall not make haste" (Isaiah xxviii:

We need to get beyond the rush and h of this headlong, impetuous age; we nee look to the eternal things, and thus look we may rest in the Lord, wait patiently his coming, and fret not ourselves in any to do evil.—The Christian.

The Tyranny of Literature.

The demands of fashion have become as perious within the realms of literature as they were in the matter of dress or addres

In this day of innumerable books and odicals a wise discrimination is imperative yet the multitude follow the approval of pu opinion implicitly.

An author of some acknowledged ability duces an inferior work—the more fictit the more eagerly accepted—and none are posed to be "well read," who have not wa their time over it.

The answer to the query whether such such a new book has been read sometimes, an infrequently, decides the literary, if not s standing of the individual addressed—w certain circles. This ought not to be. Many informed persons either conscientiously ab from or are not situated so as to have le for reading such ephemeral literature.

What do they hold, these walls of corn,
Whose banners toss in the breeze of morn?

He who questions may well be told
A great State's wealth these walls enfold.

No sentinels guard these walls of corn,
Never a sound there of warder's horn.

Yet the pillars are hung with gleaming gold,
Left all unbarred, though thieves are bold.

Clothes and food for the toiling poor,
Wealth to heap at the rich man's door!

Meat for the healthy and balm for him
Who moans and tosses in chamber dim;

Shoes for the barefooted, pearls to twine
In the scented tresses of ladies fine;

Things of use for the lowly cot,
Where (bless the corn), want cometh not;

Luxuries rare for the mansion grand—
Gifts of a rare and fertile land.

All these things and so many more,
It would fill a book to name them o'er,

Are hid and held in these walls of corn,
Whose banners toss in the breeze of morn.

Samuel Capper's Visit.

the fourth of Fifth Month, the day on the Monthly Meeting granted the ceranswer:

"BRISTOL, sixth of Fifth Month, 1841.

y Dear Friend, William Harvey:— Our ly Meeting was held on the 4th instant, y of the date of thy letter just received,
hich has been shown to Young Sturge.
ordance with the purport thereof, I shall mmence the visit till after the Quarterly g, and as time will only permit (if I have action of that meeting), or a part of my prospect to be accomplished, it appears to me probable that I may think it best to abandon that part, which I might have performed before our Quarterly Meeting. Some important matters will require my attention, and quite prevent my leaving home, until after the commencement of the Seventh Month, indeed they would have obliged me to return for two or three weeks from about the middle of Sixth Month to the second week in the Seventh Mo. had I been engaged in Ireland, during a part of this month and the early portion of next month, as I expected. Perhaps as I am writing it may be well to inform thee that the Monthly Meeting issued a certificate setting me at liberty to proceed in the service, signed by thirty-seven men and twenty-four women Friends, and also gave me a copy of a minute which I transcribe:

"'Minute of Bristol Monthly Meeting to Accompany the Certificate Granted to Samuel Capper:

"'As it appears that the nature of our friend Samuel Capper's concern is such that it can only be pursued during the summer months, it was concluded at our last meeting to leave him at liberty to proceed with it, without waiting for the Quarterly Meeting, it being understood that the concurrence of that meeting should be obtained for such part of his service as may be then unaccomplished.

"'GEORGE THOMAS, Clerk.'"

"I think thou wilt have now the whole matter before thee. I am content with the issue, as I have done all I could properly do in the matter. I am with love to thyself and friends in Cork generally, thy affectionate friend,

"SAMUEL CAPPER."

The prosecution of my object was thus put off until a period in which it was unpracticable from the advanced state of the season to do much in this summer, and the Quarterly Meeting on its sitting on the sixteenth of Sixth Month, 1841, issued an endorsement as underneath:

"Quarterly Meeting of Bristol and Somerset, held at Taunton, sixteenth of Sixth Month, 1841.

"Our dear friend Samuel Capper having laid before this meeting, our women Friends being present, a concern which he has felt for some years past, to pay a religious visit in the southern parts of Ireland, and particularly to the city of Cork, chiefly with a view of holding meetings with those who are not members of our religious Society, and having produced a certificate from Bristol Monthly Meeting expressive of unity and sympathy with him in his said concern. This meeting, after serious deliberation, cordially unites with our said Friend in his prospect, desiring that under the guidance and protection of the Shepherd of Israel he may be assisted and preserved in his arduous engagement, and be favored to return with the reward of peace.

"Signed in and on behalf of the said meeting by YOUNG STURGE, Clerk.

"Signed in and on behalf of the women's meeting by MARY WRIGHT, Clerk."

On the fourth of Seventh Month my friends, Thomas Doyle, Robert Charlton and I arrived in Cork, and were met by several friends. We lodged at the house of our kind friend, Wm. Harvey, and the next day conferred with a number of Friends of Cork Meeting, who discussed the prospect I had and pressed upon me not to attempt anything until after the Monthly Meeting to be held on the eighth. I brought under their notice that I had now waited until the season for service of this kind was nearly passed over and that I felt very much losing a single evening. Abraham Beale and Joseph Harvey both signified that they could have nothing to do with the concern, calling it an awful engagement and so forth. Wm. Harvey, Wm. Martin and some others appeared willing to assist in carrying it out, but there was certainly a general disinclination to forward the prosecution of the engagement; this disinclination was very much increased, on account of the contested election for the city which had just commenced and was to last a week, at which time the election for the county, also contested and held in the city, was to take place, and would continue another week, it was therefore concluded to commence at Bandon, about fifteen miles from Cork, and accordingly on the next evening a public meeting was held there in the tent, which was largely attended by both Protestants and Romanists. There might be about five hundred present, many of them quite young and probably about equally divided between Protestants and Romanists. Several Wesleyan preachers were present, one of whom thought the tent admirably calculated to meet the prejudices of the people, the meeting was a solemn and favored one, as I apprehended.

Some of us returned to Cork to attend the Monthly Meeting there on the eighth instant, while others proceeded onward to make preparation, if they could, for meetings at Clonakilty and Skibbereen, but as the populace were greatly excited about the election, it was doubtful how far they might succeed. The Monthly Meeting, which was held on the eighth, seems to have been a good meeting. Friends appeared rather less disposed to discouragement, and a committee was appointed to assist in carrying out the service: in the afternoon of that day we went to Clonakilty, but found that in consequence of the election, and its being market day, no meeting could be obtained that evening, we therefore went on to Skibbereen, where we succeeded in holding a meeting in the tent; our company consisted of Wm. Harvey, Wm. Martin, Thomas Doyles, Robert Charlton, Joseph Harvey of Youghal and myself. The meeting was numerously attended, but there was an unsettled disposition and inclination to disturb; the people's minds were much excited about the election. It was a trying time, but I was thankful that we succeeded to a degree of relief to my own mind. The next morning we went to Skull, and after a day wherein followed a succession of circumstances calculated to humble and drive us down to the souce of all spiritual strength, I retired to rest, confirmed in the conviction that we must look alone to superior direction and support, whilst we are occupied in such an undertaking.

SPIRITUAL house-cleaning is always in order. The Psalmist, at all times, was ready to exclaim, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

ZION'S attractions are unique, they belong to another order of beauty, the beauty of holiness.

THE TEST OF FAITH.

"He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also."

External and transient are one
In the creed by experience earned;
By external pursuits, when begun,
The eternal begins to be learned.

The curse which degraded the earth
From the harmony paradise knew,
Still affects the corporeal birth
Which humanity ramifies through.

Inherited discord disturbs
The subjection of matter to mind,
Till the curative crucifix curbs
Our revolt, with severity kind.

The work of the cross thus maintains
Its pre-eminent place in God's plan,
While the spirit by conflict regains
The dominion He purposed for man.

The working-man true therefore cares,
First of all, to be watchful within;
And his heart for the battle prepares
With the mystical motions of sin.

The father of sin, through the flesh,
And not else, can approach to delude,
Or secure in his horrible mesh
The unhappy forsaker of good.

The fastness of faith is a birth
To be reached in the spirit alone:
Let us so issue thence to the earth,
That our faith by our work may be shown!

Monachus.

Athletics vs. Gymnastics.

The steady increase in the interest taken in the so-called Field Day contests between different colleges or different classes of the same college, has been the means to call into serious discussion the ultimate utility of the practice in general. It is at present a question upon which the opinions of the best authorities differ. The fact that these athletic contests still continue and are prosecuted with increasing vigor, proves that the college authorities at least, are united for their support.

Whatever the opinion of professionals may be, the balance of public opinion is decidedly against college athletics and favorable to gymnastics. Now much ambiguity is attached to the terms "athletics" and "gymnastics." To persons who have taken no special insight into the subject, they mean one and the same thing. When gymnastics are mentioned to such persons, visions of athletic training and athletic contests with all their objectionable features rise before their minds, while the true significance of the word either does not come up at all or occupies a very small place. Athletic training means the regular exercise of certain muscles which are used in the performance of certain feats, with the sole object of performing that feat better than some one else. Gymnastic exercise means the systematic performance of movements designed to call all the muscles of the body into action thus producing an even development which must result in a perfect all-round physique. The one is pursued with increasing vigor till the field day arrives, when the whole system is taxed to its very utmost, and then frequently all the previous exercises are dropped. In it the sole and ruling motive is the desire to excel; hence the training along certain lines which will never produce a symmetrical, healthy body. In the other, a general and milder exercise is pursued with hygienic objects in view.

The writer once heard a specialist in throat and lung diseases say that a person who took exercise to develop chest muscles and lung capacity, and those alone, did not decrease his liability to consumption. If however, chest muscles were developed along with the rest of the muscles of the body, thus increasing the strength of the whole system, then there was greater power to resist disease.

This irregular and violent training and the supreme effort with which it closes, together with the excitement attending contests, are the chief objections to athletic exercises, none of which apply to gymnastics. Gymnasiums are not factories for turning out athletics or circus performers, they are not schools for military training, against which we as a Society bear testimony; but they are simply special places for gymnastic exercises. Their value as an adjunct to schools is unquestioned by all, and is attested to by the thousands of schools and colleges which are either remodelling old ones or constructing new and more commodious ones.

As intimated above, the only possible objection to a gymnasium is the fact that under improper management, it may degenerate into a place for athletic exercises, but as this tendency is easily controlled, the objection can have no weight with even the most cautious. The writer believes that the schools of our Society are, as a rule, deficient in this respect. They devote too large a per cent. of their time to the purely intellectual, which invariably causes a weakened body and consequent loss of mental force. Let all our schools have some place for physical exercise in wintry weather, and when gymnastics are mentioned, let them not be confounded with athletics.

Report of the Committee to visit Subordinate Meetings of Western Quarterly Meeting.

The committee set apart by this meeting Eight Month 19th, 1898, under a concern for our subordinate meetings, has been interested in the service, and we have visited individually as we have felt drawn, from time to time, all the meetings for worship and those for discipline.

A concern has lived in our minds, for the true interest of our fellow-members, and not merely to fulfil the appointment as such, but in waiting to know the pointings of the Master, believing that as He is the originator and appointer in right concerns, He only can lead along in them, as we, in self abasedness, and in the silence of all flesh, desire his help and strength.

We have been made to acknowledge the merciful dealings of our kind Heavenly Father, as we have been witnesses of his continued favors to his children, even to those who seem to have made but a partial surrender of their hearts unto him.

After a pretty general visit of the committee, it seemed right to attend the meetings as a body, and notice was given of this prospect, and of the desire of the committee to meet with the members.

There was comfort in this service, and the meetings were well attended by our members and others interested. We have been much exercised on account of the non-attendance our, so-called smaller meetings, and while c forted, as above stated, in larger gatherin when previously notified, yet it seems sorr ful that regular meetings are so neglected Friends, both on First-days and those during the week. It would seem, what is nee to make any of our meetings what they sh be is individual faithfulness, even to the atte ance of all the meetings as they come in cou Though our meetings are small, they are dead, and the remnant is precious to our life, and their very lives are in our Fath keeping. Let us witness a return of anc zeal and do each one his and her own par hasten the return of the precious "wate seasons" of which our ancient Friends witness and which are continued to the fa ful, even the Heavenly showers of God's to the souls which He has made, that in homes and in our meetings, the descen dew may be felt to soften and refresh. who hath suffered some of our meeting be reduced in membership, in many insta by death, in others through unfaithfulnes abundantly able to raise up standard bea and will as we are faithful, be with even two or three assembled for Divine worshi their comfort and to the strengthening of Church at large.

We have felt very much exercised and cerned on account of a practice engaged one of our meetings, of holding what migl termed a Bible meeting. We doubt not members are concerned for the welfare of souls, and we have been much interest them and in the meeting, and while we want them, and all to hold the Scriptur great respect, and are thankful to our Hea Father that He has mercifully given us s wise testimony for our help, we would re mend the frequent reading of them in ret ness in their homes, which would enabl Spirit of Truth, the Spirit of the Lord, to them to their understanding, as he sees fi He only can; yet the practice of holding ings for their study and discussion and ex tion, we believe will only in great measu get a head knowledge and is directly a the testimony of the Scriptures them To such, the language of the dear Saviou be applicable: "Search the Scriptures, them ye think ye have eternal life and are they which testify of me. Items Concerning the Society.

Joel Bean has returned to his home in Califor-nia from his visit to the Sandwich Islands.

Abram Fisher has been granted by Rich Sduare Monthly Meeting, N. C., a minute to attend Indiana Yearly Meeting, held at Richmond, also Baltimore Yearly Meeting and some other service.

Notes from Others.

Mischievous is the irreverent and scornful use of the tongue that often vulgarizes the very temple of sweetness and purity. No person of refinement and culture can doubt that irreverence is one of the perils of our day.—Newell Hill.

Dr. Rice, of Boston, the best informed man in the country on this question, has recently asserted "that with the exception of the few larger churches, the salaries paid to ministers have been universally reduced," and at this time of writing there are at least five hundred qualified clergymen in the Con-gregational Church anxious for work, and the Church is so full of preachers that there is no work for them to do."

When and by Whom was the First Concordance of the Bible Made?—An index or alphabetical catalogue of all the words and also a chronological account of all the transactions in the Bible was first made under the direction of Hugo de St. Caro, who em-ployed as many as five hundred monks upon it, 1247. It was based on one compiled by Anthony of Padua. Thomas Gibson's "Concordance of the New Testa-ment" was published in 1535; John Marbeck's "Concordance" (for the whole Bible) in 1550. Cruden's was first published in London in 1737. The latest was published by James Strong in 1894. It is the most complete, and is expensive.—N. Y. Tribune.

We find in the Philadelphia Press of Seventh Month 4th, 1899, the following statement:

"Bishop Foster, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in a recently published article utters an earnest cry against the prevailing worldly spirit among church members. 'Our great dangers are assimilation to the world, neglect of the poor, sub-stitution of the form for the fact of godliness, an abandonment of discipline, a hireling ministry and an impure Gospel, which, summed up, is a fashionable church. Elaborately dressed and ornamented choirs, who in many cases make no profession of religion and are sometimes sneering skeptics, go through cold, artistic performances in which there is as much spiritual worship as in an opera or a theatre. Worldly socials, fairs, festivals and concerts have taken the place of the revival, class and prayer-meetings of former days. Methodist pulpits for-merly dealt in the great central truths of the Gos-pel. Now the pulpit deals in generalities, or de-livers popular lectures.'"

An article in the Presbyterian Standard on "Why Presbyterianism has declined in New York," de-clares that "a distinct lapse of faith is at the bot-tom of the trouble." "The church of the West-minster Confession," says the writer, "gets its sole vitality from earnest conviction, for its manner of worship is comparatively bare, with few appeals to merely æsthetic tastes. People must believe heart-tily in Presbyterian doctrine in order to be content to remain in its simple fold. . . . People who have lost devotion to tenets peculiar to their own denomination and become indifferent to them are easily subject to distractions. The teaching of one Church satisfying them as well as that of another, they are to select their religious home according as it appeals to their fancy in the matter of decora-tion or the more agreeable social character of its inmates, and Presbyterianism, comparatively bare and ascetic suffers accordingly."

If in the place of "Presbyterian" in the fore-going we were to read "Friends," it would furnish a very good explanation of a condition with which we are confronted in many localities. In these places, and in fact very generally throughout our branch of the church, there is a large percentage of the membership who have no deep conviction on the distinguishing doctrines of the Society and could not give an intelligent doctrinal reason for their connection with Friends.—North Carolina Friend.

The Dance of Death.—Mission workers who have taken statistics among fallen women tell us that seventy-five per cent. ascribe the first cause of their downfall to dancing. Professor LaFloris says: "I can safely say that three-fourths of these two thousand five hundred abandoned women in San Francisco were led to their downfall through the influence of dancing." A chief of police of New York City has said that "three-fourths of the women and girls who are living lives of immorality have been led from the path of virtue through the dance."

Meaning of the Recent Yom Kippur, or Jewish Atonement Day.—According to the behests of Juda-ism, actual guilt cannot be converted into right by any act of forgiveness or atonement, human or di-vine. The definition of the Hebrew word Kofar, which is the root of Kippurim, conveys quite a dif-ferent meaning. It denotes "covering up," to "overlay." It means that by carrying out resolu-tions of repentance into practice man will be able to "cover up" a multitude of sins. This is the ra-tional idea of Judaism regarding the expiation of sins. This is the cornerstone of salvation as at-tained through man's own efforts.

A Peculiarity in the Dunkord's Creed.—Church-town, Pa., Ninth Month 14th.—The refusal of a Dunkard farmer to receive back a horse that had been stolen from him, has created a great deal of discussion in this valley where nearly every farmer belongs to a religious sect. The farmer whose horse was stolen made no effort at all to recover the beast. He did not make his loss known to his neighbors until they had inquired what had become of his big roan. Then he said that one night some-body broke open his stable door and took the horse, but nothing else. The news soon spread and a town-ship constable captured the animal on the Welsh Mountain, but the thief escaped. When the con-stable took the horse back to the owner, the farmer said: "I do not want the horse. The man who took it must have had more use for the animal than I had or he would not have been driven to steal. Give it back to him. If he wants my harness and wagon, let him have them also."

The farmer was a man of his word, and the horse was led away, and is still in possession of the con-stable. Strangely enough, nearly every man be-longing to his special sect hereabouts approves his action. They refer to the Bible as their authority. One passage cited is Matthew v: 40: "And if any man will sue you at the law and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also." As these sects never go to law, they simply believe that if any man takes their coat they should also freely give their cloak, or if anyone takes their horse, they should also let him have their wagon. Once a thing is stolen from them they will never receive it back as their property.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES. The Navigation Bureau of the Navy Department has issued a list of vessels of the United States navy of all kinds, making the surprising showing of 312 craft. This includes many small vessels and craft captured in Cuba and the Philippines, but the showing is, nevertheless, remarkable in comparison with the naval list of two years ago.

The business of the New York Postoffice in Eighth Mo. was remarkably large. The number of money orders was 61,835 greater than in the corresponding month last year. The total receipts from sales of stamps was $472,918, from stamped envelopes $80,415 and from postal cards, $51,300.

Notwithstanding the increase in public school accommodations in N. Y., the demand is still greater than the supply. In the borough of Manhattan alone, 2,950 children have thus far been denied admission to the schools, and 5,300 more have been placed in half-day classes. The total registration on the first day was 236,816, an increase of 16,365 as compared with last year. The number of teachers was 5,220, and 168 more were appointed on the 13th instant. There are 135 teachers absent.

The United States purchased nine million dollars' worth of sisal grass from Mexico during the last fiscal year, more than the combined purchases of the two previous years.

A lecture on "The Hague Conference" was delivered last week in the Race Street Meeting House, by W. Evans Darley, of London. W. S. Darley said the question seemed intimately associated with the city of Philadelphia. The Hague Conference is one of those events it is exceedingly difficult to measure—an event of far-reaching importance. Never before in the history of the world have civilized nations met together to discuss peace. In the old world there is a condition of constant conflict, and Europe may be described as a collection of armed camps. The leaders of nations are ever on the alert. The Czar, said he, did not propose to discuss any questions of disarmament. The inception of the Peace Conference has arisen out of the condition of Europe. In France and Germany the army is practically the nation, and the expense of keeping up these armies has been very great. All kinds of motives have been attributed to the Czar. Militarism in the old world is eating into the life of the nations, and it is rapidly increasing. The ground has been that the only way to preserve peace is to be ready for war, but unfortunately peace has not been preserved. The foremost ruler of the world has dared to say this policy of ours has proved a failure. The inception of the conference was in what the Czar calls the economic crisis of Europe. No serious efforts seemed to have been made at The Hague to check these enormous armaments. They took up the matter and referred it back to their Governments. Probably that was the best thing they could have done. The conference was accepted as the first of a series, and in that there is immense hope. The conference provided for a system of arbitration and a permanent court. The result will be far reaching, and will be a great step forward to universal peace. What is wanted is an extension of the system of the United States to the whole world. It is a result worth living for. We ought to lay down our lives for our brethren, but Christianity nowhere permits us to take the life of another.

Cornelius Vanderbilt died suddenly on the 12th instant from an attack of paralysis, at his New York City residence, aged fifty-six years.

The gates of the National Export Exposition opened in this city on the 14th instant. The attendance has been large.

On the 13th instant the conference on the uses and abuses of trusts and combinations began at Chicago and continued until the 16th. The principal speakers were William J. Bryan and Bourke Cochran. W. J. Bryan proposed as a remedy that a State should have the right to prohibit any foreign corporation doing business in the State except under certain restrictions, and that Congress should enact restrictions and limitations, even to the point of prohibition, upon any corporation organized in one State that wants to do business outside of the State contrary to public good. In other words, he favored Federal regulation for foreign corporations and the amendment of the United States Constitution if necessary.

Bourke Cochran's idea of a remedy for overcapitalization was publicity of the resources of each corporation. He found no fault with a concern which cheapened production, because such, in the end, was for the betterment of the community. Neither did he favor indiscriminate opposition to corporations. He believed in vigorous supervision by the State, but did not favor fanciful experiments. He spoke, not as an enemy of corporations, but as an opponent of dishonest ones. It will be noted that Bryan proposes Federal supervision of trusts and Cochran leans to the State as the regulator.

Anti-trust delegates to the National Trust Conference at Chicago decided to make the anti-trust movement a national one. A meeting of prominent anti-trust delegates met after the adjournment of the conference and adopted plans for an anti-trust movement national in scope, and an Executive Committee was appointed.

Metallurgists have estimated that there is between $50,000,000 and $800,000,000 in gold buried in the rocks and gravel in the 54,000 acres of barren New Mexican ground.

The Public Ledger says, editorially: "Cape Nome, the new Alaska gold field, which is said to be remarkably rich, and which is expected to yield $2,000,000 worth of gold this season, is on the extreme western edge of the continent, and is scarcely more than a hundred miles from Behring Straits. Should it continue to yield as richly as the miners estimate that it will, the next thing in order will be a railroad to connect it with the United States system, and when this is done it will be a mere matter of course to make steamer connection with the Siberian Railway at Vladivostock, and so complete an almost all rail connection with Europe."

The American Issue says: "Hoopeston, Ill., boasts of never having a saloon within her border, and yet visitors declare she has more paved streets and good sidewalks than any city of her size in the State. She has electric lights, water works, Greer College, splendid high schools and the largest canning factory in the world."

Fifty-four new cases of yellow fever and three deaths had been reported in the past forty-eight hours at Key West on the 18th inst., making a total to date of 362 cases and 17 deaths.

A Saratoga despatch says that forest fires are extending with terrible rapidity in the lower Adirondacks, and have got beyond control. Portions of Warren and Hamilton Counties are being devastated.

There were 364 deaths in this city last week, which is 41 less than the previous week and 2 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 83 were children under one year of age; 187 were males and 177 females: 46 died of consumption; 29 of heart diseases; 23 of marasmus; 18 of cholera infantum; 15 from casualties; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 14 of convulsions; 13 of inanition; 13 of pneumonia; 12 of typhoid fever; 11 of diphtheria; 10 of apoplexy, and 9 of uræmia.

FOREIGN.—The text of President Kruger's reply to Secretary Chamberlain's last communication was issued on the 18th inst. The language in many places is taken to indicate a firm, unyielding position. The reply, however, concludes: "If her Majesty's Government is willing and feels able to make this decision, a joint commission, as at first proposed by Mr. Chamberlain, it would put an end to the present state of tension. Race hatred would decrease and die out, and the prosperity and welfare of the South African Republic and the whole of South Africa would be developed and furthered and fraternization between the different nationalities would increase."

A well preserved Roman camp has been discovered on the right bank of the Narenta, in Herzegovina. A section 330 feet long by 270 feet wide has been traced. Part of the walls, gates and towers are still standing, and many utensils and weapons have been dug up. It is believed that the camp was erected in the time of Nero.

The following was received from the city of Mexico dated the 13th inst.: "Something of a sensation has been caused by the new attitude of the Catholic clergy regarding civil marriages, which alone legalizes marriage. Formerly the clergy refused to recognize civil marriage but are now urging women to be careful to secure the ceremony, as many men, taking advantage of the fact that the religious ceremony is not recognized in law, marry then desert their wives. It is believed this new attitude of the clergy is another of the many convincing proofs that the Pope cordially recognizes the republican form of government here as in France."

following story has seemed relished in uarters:

VHAT MINISTERS PAY TO PREACH.

n I was a rector of a church in Balti- ays an Episcopalian bishop) I used to ear old lady in the garb of a Quaker en in the congregation of the church. the wardens said to me:—

. —— is a great friend of yours."

n glad to hear it," I replied.

," said the warden, "she said to me, 'I hear your pastor preach, but I should so much better if he did not receive or it.

t,' said the warden, 'he pays twenty d dollars a year for the privilege of ig to us.' es he, indeed? And how so? asked the an.

ell, we both were educated at the same are about of an age, and I earn twenty- ousand dollars a year at my profession, only receives three thousand dollars.' ell thee,' said the dear old Quaker, 'I vays hear him hereafter with a great e pleasure.' "

The break in the principle against preaching for hire is not to be measured by the amount of the pay, but is effectually accomplished on consenting to receive the first farthing. A cord is as clearly severed when parted by a thin blade as by a ton of rock.

Our testimony against paid preaching once broken, the question afterwards of more or less to be received belongs to some other principle. It might be coveteousness, of which, however, the above does not appear to be an instance. It may be the ranking of sermons as but human products and so marketable according to talent displayed. Indeed some regularly get theirs copyrighted. It may be something else, like social standing of the church, etc. That is not our present concern. It is enough that the holding of the principle is broken by a cent, and those under our name will seem to endorse the breach by attendance.

Truly Reverend and Honorable.

The command "Let the wife see that she reverence her husband," makes a loud command to the husband to be worthy of her reverence.

"Husbands love your wives," is a command which should awaken wives to the importance of abiding in true loveliness.

Why do we testify against prefixing the word "honorable" to names of men in authority? Because truth is not seen invariably to justify it. We often find men of that class so very dishonorable. Shall we honor a case of dishonorable character or temper? But the command is, "Honor thy father and thy mother." What telling evidence is this that its Author expects parents to be honorable—to command respect by deserving it!

Neither can we command our families love by being regardless of whatsoever things are lovely, nor their sympathy by accusations and complaints.

On the other hand, are we excused from loving one to whom we are pledged, on discovering unlovely traits? or from reverence on the appearance of faults? Whatever human deserving has a right to claim, Christian duty covers much more. "Love covers the multitude of sins." What would become of the world, if He who hates the sin, did not love the sinner, to save him? And if his servants were not clothed with a measure of the same spirit? Accordingly notwithstanding many failings of flesh and spirit mutually to be borne, a true heart will cherish reverence for the holy relation which has been covenanted in marriage, and love of one another. "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ," the law of self-sacrifice for others. Nothing shines more beautiful than the loyalty of love sustained by grace, which we sometimes see in a partner, in proportion as the odds seem against it. But the practice of the law of Christian duty on the one part by no means excuses unworthiness on the other. Advantage may be taken of it to set one at ease in his or her selfishness. But it adds to one's condemnation, if he does not consent to be won over from selfishness into a reciprocal fulfilling of the same law of Christ.

And for the position of the father and of the mother there is implanted in the spirit of the child a sense of honor and regard, which often it takes many discouragements to demolish. It is to the honor of the same Divine grace that it is not oftener discouraged and reversed. Children should cultivate this sense and parents help them in it, for the good of their best life. As parents will, by their character and conduct, co-operate with their Heavenly Father in commanding this honor and respect, they will so govern themselves as to "Provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged. But bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

It has been said that every member of the family is doubly endowed. He can help to make home an anticipation of heaven, or the reverse.

ON a public highway, near Boston, is a well which, for many years, has freely furnished water for man and beast. It was the gift of an old sea captain who was once shipwrecked, and rescued when nearly perishing with thirst, after floating many days in an open boat. While in this ordeal of suffering, he covenanted that, if God would even give him the opportunity, he would dig a well and make it free to the public. A home or hospital for consumptives has recently been built and endowed in Chicago by a certain rich man. He says the idea was formed during the weary months he watched and ministered at the bedside of a much loved and only daughter, who died of this disease. Thus we have illustrations of how God's children, while passing through the valley of Baca, or weeping, are inspired to dig wells for the comfort of those who come after.

WANTED to-day—Men and women, young and old, who will obey their convictions of truth and duty at the cost of fortune and friends and life itself.

Saving Faith.

I submit a quotation which seems to me exactly what Friends have insisted upon for two centuries.—E.

"Faith, according to Paul, is the act whereby a man identifies himself with Christ, becomes actually one with Him in nature, and is thus enabled to die and rise again with Him. Faith is thus the indispensable, and at the same time the all-sufficient condition of salvation. Viewed in this way, it is an act of the profoundest spiritual meaning. It is not mere assent, intellectual or moral, it is not a mere confidence in Christ's words or in his promises; it is the reception of Christ himself into the soul. By it a man becomes completely one with Christ for Christ enters into and abides with every believing, that is, every receptive, man. Faith is thus not an act at all, but simply the attitude of receptivity toward Christ. Paul's view of the character and quality of faith appears perhaps as clearly as anywhere in the words: 'By their unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by thy faith. Be not high-minded, but fear; for if God spared not the natural branches, neither will He spare thee' (Rom. xi: 20, 21).

"Faith is here made the opposite of high-mindedness, or pride, or self-confidence.

"It is clear, therefore, that the essence of faith, according to Paul, is the renunciation of confidence in self, and the absolute dependence upon and trust in another; a spirit of humility and self-renunciation which alone fits one for the indwelling of Christ. So long as this attitude of receptivity, this self-emptiness and openness to the Divine Spirit, is maintained, Christ dwells in the man, living in Him and through Him the Christian life, the free spiritual life over which no (outward) law has dominion. But if the faith be lost, if a man fall into unbelief, or become high-minded and fail to maintain the true attitude of receptivity, Christ will depart, and He will come again under the control of the flesh and under the dominion of the law.

"Faith, or the attitude of receptivity toward the Spirit of God, thus conditions not merely the beginning, but the continuance of the Christian life.

"Only to a receptive man will the Divine Spirit be given, and only in such a man will it abide. . . The righteousness of God, or the righteousness of faith, of which Paul has so much to say, is not primarily, as he uses it, a forensic or legal term, but stands for a real thing, the actual divine righteousness or righteous nature which man receives from God when he receives God's Spirit.

"It is righteousness not imputed, but imparted to man; and imparted just because the Divine nature or Spirit, which is itself righteous is imparted to him."—Arthur Cushman McGiffert, in The Apostolic Age.

In a world where there is so much to sadden and depress, how blessed the communion with Him in whom is the one true source and fountain of all true gladness and abiding joy!

Take the yoke, the cross, the contrariety of Jesus upon your spirits daily.—I. Penington.

For "The Friend."

Stephen Grellet and the Emperor Alexander of Russia.

In reading the Memoirs of the Life and Gospel Labors of Stephen Grellet, now for sale at Friends Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, the writer was much interested to find the subject of the arbitration of national disputes, had taken strong hold of the mind of the Emperor Alexander of Russia about eighty years ago, as the following interesting extract will show—It was in the course of a religious visit to that Empire made by Stephen Grellet accompanied by William Allen of England.

"Third Month 9th, 1819.—We spent as we usually do once a week, about two hours, with Prince Alexander Galitzin, Prime Minister of the Emperor. He told us that the Emperor had given orders for the immediate translation from the Slavonic into the Russian language of those portions of the Bible in our Scripture lessons, that are not already translated, and to have these Lessons immediately printed. The new Testament in Russ is now printed, but the Bible is not yet done; the translation not being completed. The Emperor being apprised that the time of our departure is near, has directed the Prince to have letters of introduction prepared for us, addressed to the Governors of the Provinces through which we travel, and to his ambassadors to those nations where we may come; the expressions used by the Prince are 'to recommend you, as being well known to him the Emperor.'

"14th, our departure appearing to be at hand has brought us under very close engagements during these last days; we have had many services of a public and more private character; some of these partings, which most probably are a final separation from one another, have been very solemn; we rejoice that we can entertain the hope that we have left behind us a seed that the Lord has visited. Many of our private opportunities are also tendering seasons; the one we had this evening with the Emperor was particularly so. Having received information that he would be pleased to see us this evening, we went at eight o'clock, to the hour appointed. He again received us in his own apartment, to which we went by a private door and staircase, without passing among the guards or the persons attending at the palace; no one, anywhere, has appeared to take offence at our keeping our heads covered. He received us with cordiality as before. One of the first things he said was, that the chains we saw on the prisoners at Abo were now removed, and that the man we told him of, who had been eighteen years loaded with fetters, was now liberated, and orders were given for the better treatment of the prisoners generally.

"He requested also that in the course of our visit through Russia, we would communicate directly to him, whatever we may notice in the prisons, or other places, that we may think proper to bring before him. The Military Governor had related to him what we had said of the improvements that might be made in the prisons in Petersburg, and he was pleased that the Governor has so speedily attended to it; he added that the Empress, his mother, had given him some relation of the visit we had made to her, with which she had been very much pleased. She told him also what had been said respecting the neglected education of the daughters of the poor, which she had taken much to he he also felt so much the necessity of a spe remedy, that yesterday he made appropriat of money sufficient to establish and support schools for that class in this city, so that t might receive a virtuous and religious edu tion. He said he had carefully looked over Scripture lessons that we had prepared, was delighted with them; that had we com Russia for no other service than this, it accomplishing an important work; that would have these lessons introduced for use of all the schools in his dominions. also gave us an account of the manner in w he was educated from a child, under the of his grandmother the Empress Catha The tutors placed over him he says, were of some good qualities, but were not Chri believers, consequently his early education calculated to estrange him from serious imp sions, and yet, after the manner of the G Church, he was trained up in the habit o peating some formal prayers, morning evening, but he disliked the practice o several times, however after having go rest, he so strongly felt the convictions o for the impropriety of some parts of his duct during the day, that he was constr to rise from his bed, and on his knees, tears to entreat the Lord's forgiveness strength to act with more watchfulness. strong convictions continued with him length of time; but by degrees, for wa attending to them, they became more and faint; with dissipation, sin gained mor more ascendancy over him; but in the 1812 the Lord's visitation in love and was renewedly extended to him in a pow manner. It was about that time that a person, (it was the Prince Alexander G who had been brought up with him), r mended him to read the Scriptures, and him a Bible, which he had not seen befor devoured it' Said the Emperor, 'findin words so suitable to, and descriptive state of my mind. The Lord by his Spirit was also pleased to give me an standing of what I read therein; it is t inward Teacher alone that I am inde therefore I consider Divine inspiration, teachings of the spirit of God, as the foundation of saving knowledge.' He much more on these subjects in a f manner. We entered pretty fully in nature of the peaceable kingdom of Chri to what the spirit of the dear Redeeme is Love, would lead all those who are ob to his dictates; on which he stated, how his soul's travail had been that wars and shed might cease forever from the earth he had passed sleepless nights on acco it, deeply deploring the woes and misery b on humanity by war, and that whilst hi was bowed before the Lord in prayer, th of all the crowned heads joining in th clusion to submit to arbitration whate ferences might arise among them, inst resorting to the sword, had presented it his mind in such a manner, that he aros bed, and wrote what he then so sensibl that his intentions had been misunders misrepresented by some, but that love and to man was his only motive in the sight. He was in Paris at the time he that plan. We had spent a considerab ersing on these very important subjects, he said, 'We are then going to be soon rated in this world, but I am a full believer through the Lord's Spirit, we may, though rated one from another, feel the fellowship communion of spirit; for with the Lord is no limitation of space.' He requested we would write to him as to a Christian l, through Prince Alexander Galitzin. lly,' said he, 'I have one more request to , that before we separate, we silently once more in waiting on the Lord, if so at He condescend to give us a manifesta- f his Divine life and presence, as He did rmer occasions.' We were prepared to e to his request, for we felt in a precious er the wings of heavenly love to be hed over us; The Lord was present during mn silence that came over us; our souls very reverently prostrated before Him; nself ministering to us in a most gracious er. After a while, in the love of Christ, constrained to impart a few words to the Emperor for his encouragement, that he old fast in the ways of the Lord unto the ully relying on the efficacy of his Divine to preserve him from all evil, and to then him for every good work. He was t in tears; then dear Allen, on bended supplicated the Lord on his behalf, and f his people. The Emperor, who had d by him, continued some time thus pros- after William had ceased utterance. Our tion was solemn.

(To be concluded.)

The Phosphorescence of the Sea.

No doubt quite a number of our young readers have been to the seashore during the season, and, possibly their quick, observing eyes have taken in the strange sights to be seen in the ocean. Among these the phosphorescence of the jellyfish is one of the unexplained mysteries of the sea.

Nearly all the jellyfishes are luminous, and on the dark nights the sight as one gazes into the water is a marvellous one. Instead of darkness and gloom, the water appears to be filled with lights which move in every direction, with long tails like comets, others like mimic suns and moons. These remarkable creatures are so delicate that many can be seen, but not felt, and nearly all are ninety-five per cent. water; so that when exposed to the sun they soon disappear, evaporating like water itself. They range in size from specimens just visible to monsters almost capable of stopping a boat, and with a maze of tentacles sufficient to drown a man or seriously poison him by the discharge of their batteries of lasso cells.

One of the largest jellyfishes ever seen in American waters was once observed by Louis Agassiz, who found it floating on the surface in Massachusetts Bay. An oar was used to measure it, and across the disc it was seven feet, while the mass of tentacles as they stretched away was over one hundred feet in length. Imagine this monster, this mass of solidified water luminous, a gigantic comet moving through the depths of the ocean, each individual tentacle standing out in high relief against the dark water, and some conception may be had of the sights to be seen beneath the sea.

The light emitted by these jellyfishes is called phosphorescence, but what it is or how it is produced is more or less a mystery. In some it invests the entire animal; in others the umbrella of the jelly is the light-giving organ, while in others it is confined to certain portions of the body. The lights vary in color. The common tint is yellow or white, while blue, green, and red are seen, so that the jellies appear like gems in the sea scintillating with all the tints of the diamond.

The light of jellyfishes has a practical value. On the New England coast the mackerel fishermen take advantage of it by following the schools at night, relying upon the telltale jellies and other minute light-givers to expose the situation of the fish, which they really do by a very simple process. The mackerel, by swimming along in a vast body, disturb the jellies, irritating them so that the entire school looks like a patch of fire on the water, which can be seen from the top mast of the mackerel-men a long distance off. Toward it the vessel is directed, the large net thrown about the fiery spot, and enormous hauls of fish made.

If a single school of fish can change the water for acres into a mass of seeming fire, we can imagine the appearance of the ocean in a storm where phosphorescent animals abound. The effect in such cases is often remarkable. Ahead of the ship will be a mass of foam blazing like fire, and so brilliant that the sails, masts and rigging are illumined by it. In such a sea one of the most remarkable of all phenomena was observed—a luminous waterspout. The spout was large and seemed lost in the clouds, a little pillar of fire travelling by night, and so appalling a spectacle that it terrified mariners; yet the simple phosphorescent jellyfishes, diatoms, noctiluca, and others, were the cause; whirled about, torn apart by the rushing waters, the light was augmented until the entire monster column appeared to blaze with light and stand out against the sky like a pillar of fire. Such a sight might well excite the superstitious fears of the sailors and augment the terrors of the sea.

One of the most remarkable of the jelly-like luminous animals is known as the pyrosoma, or "fire-body." It resembles a cylinder, open at one end, from six inches to four or five feet in length, and is in reality a community of animals, better known as an ascidian. A ship once sailed through a sea of these creatures, with a result that was awe inspiring. The water had a milky appearance, and looked, upon examination, as though it were filled with red-hot cylinders. The sea when it broke gave a spectral glare to everything, so that the sails and rigging cast dark shadows on the deck.

Some of these fire-bodies were nearly five feet in length, and presented a most singular spectacle when brought on deck, great waves of fire sweeping over the surface, which seemed to be studded with bolts; or to have the appearance of hammered brass. The naturalist Bibra took one of these fire-bodies and placed it in a jar of water which he suspended from the ceiling, when it emitted so brilliant a light that he actually wrote a description of the animal by its own light.

These lights have their uses in the economy of nature; they are signals and warnings, and undoubtedly aid the illumination of the submarine world. The light is well known in every sea, familiar to every one who has crossed the ocean or sailed upon it, and there is hardly a branch of the animal kingdom that does not contain a light-giver; yet no one, so far, has given a satisfactory explanation of the cause of the light.—Zion's Watchman.

GOD'S Choice.—Nothing is more remarkable in the Bible than to see how God, as if to teach us to trust in nothing and in none but himself, selects means that seem worse fitted to accomplish his ends. Does He choose an embassador to Pharaoh?—it is a man of stammering tongue. Are the streams of Jericho to be sweetened?—salt is cast into the spring. Are the eyes of the blind to be opened?—they are rubbed with clay. Are the battlements of the city to be thrown down?—the means employed is, not the blast of a mine, but the breath of an empty trumpet. Is the rock to be riven?—the lightning is left to sleep above, and the earthquake with its throes to sleep below, while a rod is used that is more likely to be shivered on the rock than to shiver it.

Are men to be converted by preaching and won from sensual delights to a faith whose symbol is the cross and whose crown is to be won among the fires of martyrdom? Leaving schools, and halls, and colleges, God summons preachers from the shores of Galilee. The helm of the church is intrusted to the hands that never steered aught but a fishing-boat; and by the mouth of one who had been its bitterest persecutor the gospel was preached to the philosophers of Athens and in the palaces of Rome.—Guthrie.

Samuel Capper's Visit.

On the 11th we had a public meeting at Skull, but the priest of Ballydehobb, who celebrated Mass at Skull, publicly cursed us from the altar in the morning, and thus prevented the Romanists from attending, except a very few, yet we had an attendance of about four hundred, and a precious season it was; the company; who came from a wide district around the country appeared to me to be simple, serious persons, to whom I was engaged to declare the unsearchable riches of Christ, and by whom, so far as I could perceive, it was received in the love of the gospel, although a certain tincture of narrowness of mind, for want of perfect love casting out fear, I thought might be felt; during the opportunity about fifty or sixty persons, lads and young men chiefly, of the Romish population, stood in a lane about one hundred yards distant, and yelled and hooted in a very unpleasant manner; they were, however, a good deal quieted after a time by a man of property, a magistrate who lived near, and happened to pass by. The same evening at six o'clock, we sat with the Methodists in their own house, a small room, there were about one hundred present. It was, I thought, an interesting and instructive time, in which counsel and encouragement were dispensed. After I sat down, and a time of precious silence had ensued, the Methodist local preacher offered a prayer, in which he ran over all or most of the subjects that had been adverted to, and though verbose, I believe it was the effusion of sincerity and love. I then made a few remarks which had been upon my mind, before he knelt down, on the subject of prayer. We parted from our kind host and hostess, Nathaniel Lanin and wife, and some others on Second-day morning in much love.

Pretty soon after our arrival at Bantry we had a visit from several Methodists, who in consequence of the very disturbed state of the people's minds, occasioned by the political events then passing, expressed strongly their great fear of any act that might attract the public attention to them; the windows of several Protestant houses had been broken the evening before, and some outrages committed of a minor character. We walked about the town for some time and met two priests whose countenances looked dark, designing and bitter; feeling comfortable to do so, we left Bantry without attempting any meeting and passed on to Dunmanaway, a beautifully situated little town, where we lodged; here we learned that Daniel O'Connel was out for Dublin, and that he had consequently offered himself for Cork County. This news had a great influence on the people's minds and led our friends strongly to recommend our postponing further proceeding until after Seventh-day, when the county election must be concluded; we came therefore back to Cork and quietly waited till the next week. I need hardly say that from my two Bristol friends, as well as from William Harvey and William Martin, with others, I have received all the kind attention I could desire or expect; this excursion has, however, notwithstanding, been one in which my faith and patience have been severely tried.

From the thirteenth, Third-day, until the end of that week, I did but little, making a few visits to friends, and attending the marriage of William Malcomson and E—— Robinson.

On First-day, the eighteenth, the meetings were large, it being the Munster Quarterly Meeting. I had some service in them.

Third-day morning the twentieth, Wm. Harvey, James Doyle, Thomas Doyle, George Cox and George Gibbs, with myself set off for Brandon, where in the evening we had another favored meeting, about the same number were present as on the former occasion in this place, i. e. five hundred, nearly one-half Romanists.

To Dunmanway, we proceeded on the morning of the twenty-first. The meeting in the evening was an eminently favored time; about six hundred and fifty might be present, mostly Romanists; there was such a solemnity over us and so much tenderness about the people that I am led to hope, some of their souls received much good.

After breakfast on the twenty-second we proceeded to Clonakilty. As we could not obtain a piece of ground to put the tent upon, we concluded to appoint a meeting in the market-house. The meeting was largely attended, but the people were more unsettled than on some other occasions, going out and in; they also gathered at different times, and it was a disturbed opportunity, yet I felt peace in the belief that I have been in my right place, and that though many of the people were light, thoughtless persons, there were a number of a different character.

The twenty-third we were at the old seaport, Kinvale. The tent was erected on Lilly Green, where a great number of persons attending—three hundred or four hundred of these might be said to be at meeting, the rest walked in and out, and were considerably excited by a feeling of imagined political and real superstitious enmity; several opposed the proceeding by calling to others "to come out of that," saying that they would be sorry for it afterwards. One man rather loudly cried out several times, "what he says is very good, but where is your authority." Our meeting was much disturbed, and lasted only about an hour; yet I had a degree of peace in this endeavor to discharge my duty, and I thought I was sensible that the opposition arose, in some measure at least, from an apprehension in the opposers, that all was not right in the quarter they defended.

On the twenty-seventh of Seventh Month we had a truly refreshing, baptizing opportunity at three o'clock, First-day, in an old brewery in Kinsale, with about two hundred persons, with few exceptions Protestants, many of whom I cannot doubt, were serious, and some devoted persons. It was a season of an unusual pouring out of the spirit. We returned to Cork.

Second-day morning the twenty-sixth, my friend Wm. Harvey and myself took a walk to Blackpool, and enquired about a small piece of ground for putting up the tent; we found it belonged to a Romanist, who readily granted the use of it for a meeting. Friends, however, considered it too late in the day to make the necessary preparations, which, I believe, was a serious mistake, so the meeting was fixed for the next day.

On Third-day preparations were made, and notices spread, but from the time of commencing the erection of the tent, the concourse of people was so great—men, women and children, perhaps seven to eight hundred, and these were so restless and boisterous, that the person employed found it impracticable to get the fixed, and when we arrived at half-pa o'clock, the people began a systematic of noise and interruption; whilst they av personal insult or violence, they thus ually prevented the holding of the me and we were obliged to take down the ten doubt was entertained by some, that the was planned at the monastery close by. of its inmates were seen ordering the to destroy the notices, and actually t them themselves.

Fourth-day was spent in endeavoring a room, warehouse, or shed of any ki Blackpool, but without success. I fou best to propose a public meeting in the ing house on Fifth-day evening, whic held at seven o'clock. It was suppose six hundred persons were present. It quiet, and I believe, satisfactory me mostly consisting of the lower classes, large number of the people from Blac were present: it was thought that thos Blackpool came in consequence of the pointment about the tent meeting. whole I entertain a peaceful belief that has been done has been right.

There was a paragraph in the Cork co tion paper, headed "prevented meeting," might have tended to increase the atten at the meeting on Fifth-day.

ONE BOND LEFT.—A devoted family Society of Friends were deeply afflicted. had lost all their property and were left penniless. The wife was sad indeed, and ready to despair; but the dear old ma cheerful. The wife was almost ready spond and die. She was astonished coolness with which her husband met h so she asked him one day;

"Husband, how is it that thou bear trouble so well? It almost crushes me earth."

"Why, wife, we are not quite so bad a imagines. We have one bond left wh can live upon."

"Why, husband, what bond dost thou I thought all was lost?"

"Oh no! Here is one bond, and I wi it to thee. It is in the old family Bi reads as follows: 'I will never leave t forsake thee.'"

His wife inquired, "Does thou call bond?"

"Yes," he replied, "it is the word and cannot fail."

God's bonds are better than ours.

What One Boy Did.

were just sitting down to the table, boys, their faces bright, their eyes ng with the anticipation of the dinner as before them. It was Clifford Ray's y and his mother had said he might in- ven of his friends to a dinner party.

ord was an only child and an only grand- and, strange as it may seem, he was with three grandmothers. The way he o have more than his share of grand- s was that his mother had married so there was her mother, his father's , and his stepfather's mother; stranger ey lived together, to all appearances in and concord, and vied with each other ng and spoiling Clifford.

boys lost no time in starting on the hings, and they ate as only healthy, g boys can eat. They did not talk much they were too busy for that, but they l themselves thoroughly, which made her and the three kind old grandmothers ited on them beam with pleasure.

r they had got fairly started, Mrs. Ray ed the door of a little cupboard, built in l, and said smilingly, "Now, boys, I'm o give you your choice of some very ne. I have all kinds here, and you can ur choice, in honor of Clifford's birth-he turned to him, he answered politely, hout the slightest hesitation, "I won't y, thank you, Mrs. Ray."

boys looked at him in surprise, and Clif- mother said, "What! Not any wine? a are not so particular! Of course it 't do for boys to make a practice of g it; but this is something extra, and a won't hurt you; it will make a man of ge was tempted to reply that he knew at kind of a man it would make of him, seen men like that; but he did not like anything rude to her, so he answered , but as firmly as before, "No, thank I really can't take it. Please don't urge ford's mother was evidently annoyed. I won't press you, if it's against your les to drink it," she said, and turned to t boy with, "Well, you'll take it, Harry ge's refusal had given Harry courage to fe knew his mother would not want him the wine; but he would not have been enough to refuse it if it had not been friend's example, so he said, "I don't I'll take any, either, Mrs. Ray."

k Miller, who sat next to Harry, said the same, and so it went all around the table until it came to Clifford.

"You'd better shut up the cupboard, mother, I don't believe any of the fellows want it."

Then they went on eating their dinner and were soon as merry as if the interruption had not occurred. The incident was seemingly forgotten.

But there was one who did not forget it. In the next room there was a listener of whom none of the boys were aware. Clifford's mother's brother had long been a source of trouble to his family. It was the old story of bad company and then all sorts of dissipation. He had tried one business after another, to make a failure of all. At last he had gone away, and his family hoped that the separation from his old companions might reform him; but he came back an utter wreck and failure.

Howard Morse had come in while the boys were at dinner. He was sober then; but he intended going out later in the evening with a number of boon companions, and "making a night of it" as usual. The door between the dining-room and the library, where he had thrown himself down on the divan, was open, and he heard his sister's offer of the wine and George's refusal.

It reminded him of the time when he took his first glass of wine, and then he thought of the events which followed. Like all drunkards, at times he would have given anything he possessed to break the awful bondage, and he now wished heartily that when he had been offered his first glass he had, like George, had the courage to refuse. Then the thought came to him, "Am I going to be outdone by a boy twelve years old? What he can do, I can; it isn't too late yet. If God will only forgive me and help me, I'll never touch another drop."

A few minutes later the boys and the mother and the three grandmothers were greatly surprised to see Howard Morse walk into the dining-room and greet them cordially. Since he had started on the downward path he had kept taciturnly to himself when he was at home, and avoided meeting any of the people who visited there. This was a new Howard, surely!

After dinner, instead of hurrying out of the house, he joined the boys in the library. He was so entertaining, instituting new games, and telling thrilling stories, that no one could believe the clock right when its hands pointed to the hour for leaving.

Reluctantly the boys went home, after bidding "Uncle Howard" a hearty good-night.

As George was going Howard caught his arm and drew him aside.

"I want to tell you, George, that you have saved me to-night."

George's eyes opened wide in astonishment. "Saved you? I?"

"Yes; it was your example in refusing the wine that set me to thinking, and I resolved never to touch another drop of liquor or have it in the house. I would like to join your temperance society. I want to help save others who have been as low as I was."

George was happy that night, and when he prayed to his Heavenly Father he did not forget to thank Him for the privilege which had been given him, to save a soul by his example.

Howard Morse kept his word. He not only joined the temperance society, but later on the church, and was well known throughout the community as an earnest worker.

Some years afterward he started out as a temperance lecturer, and was the means of leading many from the "broad way that leadeth to destruction." And in all his lectures he never failed to give credit to the boy who had stood firm for his principles, and by his example pointed him to the way in which he was now walking.—*Anne G. IF WE ONLY UNDERSTOOD.

Could we but draw back the curtaine
That surround each other's lives,
See the naked heart and spirit,
Know what spur the action gives;
Often we should find it better,
Purer than we judge we should;
We should love each other better
If we only understood.

If we knew the cares and trials,
Knew the efforts all in vain,
And the bitter disappointment,
Understood the loss and gain,
Would the grim external roughness
Seem, I wonder, just the same?
Should we help where now we hinder?
Should we pity where we blame?

Oh! we judge each other harshly,
Knowing not life's hidden force,
Knowing not the fount of action
Is less turbid at its source;
Seeing not amid the evils
All the golden grains of good.
Oh! we'd love each other better
If we only understood.

How to Surprise an Enemy.—About three months before the sad daybreak when the great heart of Phillips Brooks ceased its throbbing and the busy brain its planning for the good of others, I was one noon-time seated at a table in a well-known Boston café, when two young women, earnestly engaged in conversation, entered and took the opposite seats.

One of the two, or a near friend of theirs, had evidently been grievously wronged, and after the manner of so many Boston people, had gone to talk it over with the good man, and now at this mid-day hour, were meeting by appointment to tell what had been the advice of Phillips Brooks.

"Well, what did he say, for I suppose you have seen him?"

"Yes, and he said just what we might have known Phillips Brooks would say. He listened so quietly, and with that sad smile of his, speaking never a word until we were done, and then he said, so gently: 'I am sorry for you, very—it is hard to be misunderstood, injured, wronged in this manner—and yet, shall I hurt you more if I tell you that I am not so sorry for you as for some one else?

"'Really, my friend, my larger, deeper sympathy is not for you, but for the wrong-doer, the one who so needlessly caused all this pain. It is so, so pathetic to have made so much trouble in a world already so full of heartaches. I am, oh, so sorry for him. As I have listened I have been wondering if it were not possible, after all that has occurred, to yet bring some gladness out from this pain, and if you had not best just have your revenge by forgiving all the wrong and helping him to awaken to a new life, with the hope of his yet amounting to something good. That would be such a splendid way to surprise him and would make you so much gladder than to cherish the wrong.

Are you willing to do this?' That was what he said to me," she exclaimed, with her face flushed and smiling almost through her tears, with the glad consciousness that she had been led to act worthily of her larger womanhood and was going to do this very "forgiving and helping to something good."

Selections from the Letters and Memoranda of Robert Milhous.

Fifth Month 6th, 1883.—This is truly a day of trial and affliction in which all the pillars of my foundation seem to be tried, but if only they may be firmly built upon Christ Jesus, the Rock of Ages, surely all the powers of darkness will not be able to prevail, which has been and remains to be the earnest travail of my soul, and that every evil and wrong thing may be thoroughly purged from my heart. Blessed be the Lord for his continued mercies to such an unworthy creature as myself.

Seventh Month 15th.—Under feelings of great poverty and strippedness it seems with me to record the humbling sense I have for a length of time felt that "man is prone to evil as the sparks fly upward," and were it not for the renewed visitations of Heavenly Love, from season to season, through the adorable mercy of our ever merciful Father in heaven, our souls must languish and die; yet He does, from season to season, draw us as with cords of love to Him and quicken by his Holy Spirit and strengthen the weary traveller still to hold on his way.

Eleventh Mo. 18th.—I see that four months have passed away since I have penned anything in this little book, for such have been my feelings of poverty and unworthiness that my feeling has been as though I could record nothing that might be of any worth, notwithstanding there have been seasons in which there has seemed to be fresh and undoubted evidence that I am not forsaken, and at this time I feel that I could record with feelings of gratitude to the Author of all our sure mercies that on the 16th instant, at the funeral of our departed friend W. M. that the overshadowing wing of Ancient Goodness was spread over us as a canopy, and the words of our blessed Saviour were brought to my remembrance where He said: "The son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost," etc., which I apprehended I should have delivered publicly to the large company assembled around the grave, but through weakness and fear, omitted, for which I underwent much conflict of mind, but inasmuch as I had not wilfully disobeyed the dear Master. He was pleased again to lift up the light of his countenance and speak peace to my troubled soul. Attended Chesterfield Monthly Meeting yesterday, in which our beloved friend Edward Sharpless (from within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting), was favored to declare the truth in a remarkable manner, to our edification and comfort, and I trust many hearts were made thankful for this fresh visitation of Divine love.

Twelfth Month 31st.—Another year is now nearly completed, which seemed renewedly to bring before my mind the wonderful works of the great Author of all created things. What beautiful and complete order throughout all his works! And although man is spoken of as among the noblest of his works, how comparatively insignificant is he. Even as it were a speck in the creation, and such has of late been my feeling of unworthiness that a desire has prevailed, that my dear children may be very careful not to attribute anything to the poor creature as good, merely as a man, but should I be favored, through unmerited mercy, to hold out to the end, that all may be attributed to the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, my dear Redeemer, and let all the praise be ascribed unto Him. O, I want to be more truly humbled as in the very dust before the Lord.

First Month 31st, 1884.—I take up my pen to record this as a day to be had in remembrance whilst I may be permitted to remain in this transitory state of being, as it is the day on which my dear daughter, Ruth M. Kite, departed this life. And notwithstanding I felt it to be a sore trial to part with one so dear to me, yet my heart has been made as it were to overflow with gratitude and thankfulness to that Almighty Being who created us for the purpose of his own glory, and who, without doubt preserved and supported her through many trials and tribulations, even unto the end, and has, I humbly trust, through mercy and redeeming love, gathered her into the fold of everlasting rest and peace. I feel that it rests upon me to leave this testimony concerning her; that I fully believe she was concerned from childhood to live an upright life in the sight of her Creator. A dutiful and affectionate child to me, a loving and faithful wife to her husband, and a loving and tender mother to her children, over whom she watched with anxious solicitude, and near the final close, she was enabled to commit them to the care and protection of her and their dear Redeemer.

Judge Kindly.

And above all these things put on charity (Colossians, iii: 14).

One of the most important accessories to human happiness is to be found in a charitable judgment of those with whom we are brought into contact.

To be kindly rather than harsh in criticism is an imperative duty which we most easily neglect. Charity may seem to be an insignificant virtue, but it is very wide in its results and has a great deal to do with making our life sweet, fragrant and smooth.

It is so much better to look on the bright side that I am inclined to say we cannot live a beautiful life without doing so. The most hateful and exasperating thing I know of is the tendency to see evil where you may just as well see good. Its effect on ourselves is spiritually depressing, and its effect on others is disastrous. To cultivate suspicion is to force the heart, the affections, to take slow poison. We can find no happiness in it, and we loosen the golden bonds of friendship, for the everlasting law is that what you give to others we get for ourselves.

It is impossible to love and trust without being loved and trusted in return. Cause and effect are no more sure than this statement of fact. It is equally impossible to distrust without being distrusted ourselves. I would rather be disappointed nine times out of ten than to lack confidence in my friends the whole ten times.

In the first place, it is unchristian to judge people harshly. There is religion in confic but none in suspicion. I do not care what creed is, or how earnest you are in your a tions, or how diligent you may be in the formance of your duties, if you are a finder, or if you seek for the faults rather for the virtues of you neighbors, you are removed from true religion as the star from the earth.

In the second place you cannot afford t demn, for the reactive influence on you soul is as unfortunate as it is powerful cultivate the spirit of criticism is to disco the upward tendency of mankind. To den a sinner is to give him a push along the ward path. He needs a helping hand ir of a curse.

In the third place, we are largely the of circumstance and environment. I d know what I should have been had I beer in different surroundings. When I see temptations beset half the world I wonde they are as good as they are. I do not as much as I pity. It is possible that if been rocked in another cradle and been r in another mother's arms I should not be I am now. Let us take no pride to ours because we stand on a high level.

Two duties lie before us—to be genere our judgment of our friends and to be l and helpful to all the world. Herein w a hard task, but it is a task on which the g of the soul depends. Look for the goo in the character of your neighbors, and as possible make excuse for their weakn Cultivate a spirit of love, judge gently than harshly, make the kindliness of you soul felt by all, and you will soon discove you have entered upon a new and a highe As to this seething world, which throb sorrow and guilt and remorse, be a not fluence, give of word and thought and dee the great treasury of virtue, and so spen days that not one of them will accuse y neglect.

Our Leavening Influence.

(Extract from a letter of Eighth Month 31st, su by a Report of a Yearly Meeting held the same m

I would that our own Yearly Meeting co more explicit in insisting that the conv and conversion of wandering souls is a prerogative, however providentially depo for its exercise on our keeping our pl orderly testifying to the truth as made to us. Then the primary importance o ming our own lamps, and "exhorting other lest any be hardened through the fulness of sin" (Heb iii: 13), would, I co be more steadily held in view, and th urgent as well as the most telling gosp vice be allowed to lie in the boasted cer civilization, seeing that there the conf tween principle and plausibility eve fiercely rages. I cannot but think tha largely for want of duly recognizing this dence of home duty that the church as so largely fails of exercising its appr leavening or tone-giving influence, not affairs of state, but in the conduct of life among all professions, down to t merchant, mechanic and mariner.

lways more or less of a surprise to take mmonplace thing about us and find that counterpart has been a familiar object ces of mankind since the dim, dim ages h authentic records scarcely reach. i is one such thing. We see it about lozen different forms; it wakens us in ning, announces the caller, warns us at crossings, and calls us to church, and it is so familiar we do not stop to whether this thing of sound has a or not. Turn to the encyclopedia and that bells were known in Bible days, he Chinese some two or three thousand rlier; that bells in primitive forms are o nearly every savage tribe of which any knowledge; and that the Indians ne to meet Columbus off what we now duras brought him bells as presents. hinese have been making bells about as anybody, and ought to know how, dern bell-makers in Europe and this can show the Oriental a good many bout the business, even if they haven't it quite so long. The Chinese bells ueer, rather stiff forms, and their sound ing but musical judged by the ear of tern listener. By some strange mixture ls your Chinese bell founder gives his a sort of diabolical twang, and a harsh- hich is increased by the method of g and ringing, the bells being hung ry and then struck with wooden mallets. the bells of China are very large, one, at Bell of China, in Pekin, being 14 feet t, 12 feet in diameter, and weighing dred and twenty thousand pounds. ing of large bells takes us to that n neighbor of China, whose threatening e hug these days keeps the poor Celest- guish. Russia has the largest bell in d, the Czar Kolokol (emperor of bells). ght of this bell is 21 feet, diameter 22 d it weighs 22 tons. It was cast in order of the Empress Anne, from a predecessor. At current prices the al alone in this bell would cost three thousand dollars, while reliable records hat upward of one million dollars in plate, etc., was added to the casting es of the day. The Czar Kolokol was ng from large beams, but these taking ell to the ground and was fractured, hich time it has remained dumb. It ed upon a stone foundation in 1837 by the Emperor Nicholas, and is conse- s a chapel in the Kremlin. Two men abreast can enter. There is another us bell in Moscow, which is suspended in er of Ivan Veliki. It weighs one hun- d twenty thousand pounds, and when g, which is only thrice a year, it pro- tremulous effect throughout the city, ise like the roaring of distant thunder, s of Russia are fixed, immovably, to ams. Their tongues are swung by f leather bands, and moved in such a as to cause the blows to fall upon the at irregular points. rgest bell in Europe outside of Russia na. It weighs forty thousand pounds. as one of equal weight. France once ell of thirty thousand pounds, but it ast into another form, and the Notre Dame cathedral at Paris now contains the largest, weighing five thousand pounds less. England's largest bell, "Big Ben," weighs thirty thousand pounds and there are a number of bells in England and on the continent between ten thousand and twenty thousand pounds in weight.

In America the largest bell is that in the cathedral in Montreal, weighing twenty-five thousand pounds. In the United States there are three interesting bells: the Liberty Bell in the State House at Philadelphia, of which every one knows, the Independence Hall Bell cast for the Centennial in 1876, and the Columbian Liberty Bell cast for the World's Fair at Chicago. The latter two were cast at the foundry of the Meneely Bell Company, and each weighs thirteen thousand pounds a thousand pounds for each of the thirteen original States of the Union. Much popular interest was awakened in the casting of the bell for the World's Fair, and as in the case of the Czar Kolokol and other bells many valuable donations of precious metals and jewels, heirlooms and relics of the Revolutionary war were incorporated in the casting. At least two hundred thousand persons were represented through individual or collective gifts.

So much for the notable bells of the world, and from their number and wide distribution we may infer that much is known to man about bell construction and manufacture. Bell casting has in fact come to be a very exact science. At the best foundries they will turn you out a bell of any pitch you may desire as easily as a musician tunes his violin string. The pitch of a bell depends upon its diameter and the thickness of its walls, but the quality of tone upon the ingredients of the bell metal. The best metal is made of an alloy of copper and East India tin, and the oldest bells are made of the same metals used in practically the same proportions, showing that the ancients had the art well developed even in the dawning hours of history.

Closely connected with our daily life, used as alarms in war and peace, telling us when to put out the lights, when to rise, when to pray; rejoicing with us and grieving with us, bells have come to hold a large place in the human sympathies. Thus it is not strange that many foolish superstitions have in times past been linked with bells. In the seventh century account is given of how Clotharius was driven from the seige of Sens by the ringing of the Bells of St. Stephens, Calixtus III. caused the much-feared Osmans to flee by a similar stratagem. In those days the ringing of bells was supposed to ward off storms, lightning and even pestilence. Even to this day in France they ring the bells upon the threatening of a storm likely to do injury to the vineyard, proceeding upon a theory directly opposite to that of our rainmakers, who believe that vibrations in the air will cause the formation of clouds and not their dispersion.—Pathfinder.

PERFUMES FROM COAL TAR.—Chemists have for some time past been producing—or reproducing—the more valuable perfumes in the laboratory, and in this way have succeeded in evolving from coal tar the true scents of new-mown hay, carnations, etc., the expectation being these artificial products will take the place largely of those now derived by distillation and otherwise from flowers and other parts of plants. A probable exception to this is the tube-rose, to obtain which, in its perfection, the French resort to the so-called "enflowering" process of extraction. This method consists in placing the blossoms in contact with layers of grease on panes of glass in frames, the flowers being renewed from day to day—fats of all sorts having a special affinity for perfumes, absorbing them readily, and thus the grease, which is a refined lard, takes up the odor from the blossoms, becoming at length saturated with it; the lard is now steeped in alcohol, which has a still more pronounced affinity for perfumes, and it withdraws the odoriferous essential oil from the grease. Jasmine perfume, it is stated, cannot be imitated by combination of other odors, being an exception in this respect.

Selected for "THE FRIEND"

In the large perspective Sinai and Calvary are never obsolete. You say creeds are crumbling? Yes. So the avalanches slide from the Alpine summits while the granite of God remains. People want as much as ever to be taken up into the hills. In the midst of many thoughts, novel or brilliant, but volatile and fugitive, the true minister speaks for what is at once primal and perennial. We must be true to Christ yet near to men; and the glory of it is that the truer to Christ the nearer to men, only to all men—not ancient men alone, nor modern men alone. And here is the wonder of our calling, that the deepest grasp upon Christ and the ancient faith translates itself most finely and promptly into the aptest dealing with the men of the present hour. It is as though a life-boat were anchored in midtorrent, held by the great anchor chains of faith to some Rock of Ages far up-stream, and yet at the same time lightly moving and swinging free in the foam, looking out for men as they are hurried by, swiftly shifting to meet the men, ready to save and able to save.—Albert J. Lyman.

LITTLE self-denials, little honesties, little passing words of sympathy, little nameless acts of kindness, little silent victories over favorite temptations—these are the silent threads of gold which, when woven together, gleam out so brightly in the pattern of life which God approves.—Canon Farrar.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Andrew D. White, head of the American Commissioners to The Hague Conference, replying to a letter of Edward H. Magill, says: "It is as clear to me as the day, that our Conference did the best that could be done. After a world of thought and pains by a great body of men among the most competent in the world to really discuss the subject, there was prepared a system of voluntary arbitration with a carefully stated procedure and with various subsidiary institutions to promote general mediation, special mediation and commissions of inquiry, the purpose of which last is to substitute facts carefully ascertained by experts for the insane or malicious lying, with which the public is generally deluged on both sides when questions arise likely to produce war. Our trust, to make resort to this court more and more constant and its decrees more and more like law, must be in the public opinion of various countries. My hope and, to a considerable extent, my belief, are that such public opinion will more and more oblige governments to resort to the court and to abide by its decisions. Another thing to be done by public opinion is to discountenance the sort of journalism which lives by providing sensation, reports likely to provoke hostile feelings between nations. At present that sort of thing is rampant, and especially in the United States and France. It may interest you to know that the best features of our own American plan were carefully considered, and various important parts of it adopted, but I will confess that the plan given by the Conference to the world is, in my judgment, better than that submitted by any single nation."

General Otis, having reported that the 700 Chinese detained at Manila can be landed without any serious interference with military operations, they have been permitted to land, on the promise of the Chinese Consul General that "no more Chinese will leave Chinese ports for the Philippines, unless qualified to land under the War Department regulations."

The United States gunboat Urdaneta has been captured in the Oranic River by the Filipinos, and her crew consisting of one officer and nine men, were taken prisoners or killed. The vessel was beached, riddled with bullets and burned, and her armament captured.

The Government pension roll contains 991,519 names.

The Postmaster General has issued an order extending the postage rates of the United States to Porto Rico. United States postage stamps shall be valid for postage in either direction, in addition to those now used in Porto Rico.

This country imports $19,164,047 in india rubber annually.

There was a large attendance of Governors and Attorneys General at the anti-Trust Conference in St. Louis on the 20th inst., and vigorous speeches were made by several executives denouncing monopolies and making suggestions to mitigate the trust evil. They adjourned on the 21st inst., after adopting resolutions urging the enforcement of legislation to put a stop to trade monopolies.

The smallest piece of real estate in New York is an odd-shaped corner lot, somewhat smaller than a double page of a newspaper. This limited estate is at the northwest corner of Fourth Street and Irving Place. It occupies a curious little niche in the corner property, and has a frontage of a few inches on both these important streets. Taxes are regularly paid on it, and the high rent ($50 per month) which its owner demands for it has been paid regularly for years.

At the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Union Traction Company in this city it was reported that the number of passengers carried during the year was 259,527,688, which was 20,588,315 more than the preceding twelve months. The receipts from passengers amounted to $11,793,857.76, an increase of $933,315.21.

The Massachusetts Ploughman recently said: "There were larger shipments of cats from Maine the past year than for any season previous, there being over 6400 cats shipped out of the State, going to all parts of the United States and exported to foreign countries. One concern alone, the Walnut Ridge Farm Company, of Boston, sent 986 Angoras. Besides this large shipment of Angoras, there are now over 14,860 Angora cats remaining in various sections of Maine. It is estimated that there are only 32,500 Angora cats in all America, compared with several million common cats. The number of Angora cats in Maine is gradually diminishing, there being at least 1,000 less each season. The demand is so great for them that the farmers cannot keep up with a sufficient supply. Maine people made over $50,000 last year on their cats. This is rather a lucrative business when one stops to think that three years ago but few shipments could be recorded. The express companies are large gainers."

A despatch from Hot Springs, Ark., says: "The owners of the Cripple Hill gold mines have discovered platinum in paying quantities in their mines. The assay shows five to six pounds of platinum to the ton, and the metal is worth $185 a pound."

Ardmore, I. T., is the greatest inland cotton market in the world. Over 50,000 bales of cotton are marketed each year there, which are brought into town by wagons. This is exclusive of the product shipped by railroads.

There are to be no docked horses in Colorado. A law has been passed making it unlawful to import any horses with docked tails, as well as illegal for a horse owner to so multilate any animal he owns. A fine of not less than $100 or thirty days imprisonment is the penalty.

It requires 10,800,000 pounds of meat a week to feed the inhabitants in Manhattan, Brooklyn and Jersey City.

The steamship City of Topeka has arrived at Seattle from Lynn Canal with news of an earthquake, which began on the 3rd and continued until the 10th instant. The steamer Dora carried the news to Juneau. The earthquake extended from Lituya Bay, 150 miles below Yakutat, 500 miles northwest into the Cook Inlet country. Three distinct shocks were felt at Juneau. Buildings were badly shaken. The earthquake was most severe at Yakutat. Kanan Island, at the entrance to Yakutat Bay, sank twenty feet into the sea. At high tide only the tops of trees are visible. Huge fissures opened in the earth. The steamer Dora's passengers say that in two minutes the ocean rose twenty feet above high tide and almost as quickly subsided. It is said many people have deserted their homes and are living in tents on the beach. Many have gone to Juneau.

There were thirty new cases of yellow fever and two deaths at Key West on the 24th.

There were 371 deaths in this city last week, which is 7 more than the previous week and 5 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 186 were males and 185 females: 44 died of heart diseases; 44 of consumption; 30 of marasmus; 21 of pneumonia; 19 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 18 of diphtheria; 14 of nephritis; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of cancer; 12 of debility; 11 of inanition; 11 of cholera infantum, and 10 from casualties.

FOREIGN.—According to a recent official return England during the last ten years has paid off $355,000,000 of her national debt, and as a matter of rank in the debtor nations has sank to third place, France and Russia occupying respectively the first two.

The Cape Town correspondent of the Daily Mail says: "President Kruger has cabled a strong personal appeal to the Queen, beseeching her to interfere to prevent bloodshed."

A German army officer estimates that in the century just closing no less than 30,000,000 men have been killed in war in civilized countries.

Europe consumes annually about 2,500,000 bales of jute.

The French Cabinet has pardoned Captain Alfred Dreyfus, who has been released from prison.

Peasants in the South of France spend about ten cents a day for food for a family of five.

There is a marked growth in the German imports of American iron and steel, and several American firms will establish plants at Berlin.

In Germany the number of girl graduates is increasing in a remarkable fashion. Three years ago the ten great schools had their books 177 female students. At the end of 1897 the total had risen to 347, and whereas in the previous year the girl students were mainly concentrated in Berlin, every university except Munster contributed to the roll of female graduates. At the beginning of this year the total had again increased to 400.

Dr. Ekholm, Professor Nathorst and Captain Andree believe that the buoy marked "Andree Polar Expedition," found on Ninth Month 9th on the north coast of King Charles Island by the master of the Norwegian cutter Martha Larsesk, is one of those which the aeronaut intended to throw after the North Pole was passed.

For every million inhabitants in Russia there are only ten newspapers and journals of all sorts.

Though Russia is one of the greatest lumber producing countries in the world, yet considerable quantities of finer wood, such as cabinet work woods, rosewood, mahogany, etc., are imported every year.

The Russian Abyssinian expedition has discovered a new range of mountains between 8.30 and 6 north latitude and 36.30 longitude. By permission of the Czar the mountains have been named Nicholas II Range.

The conspirators against the life of ex-King Milan were tried at Belgrade on the 25th. Two were sentenced to death, one of whom was shot, and the other pardoned by the King. Ten were sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, one to nine years, seven to five years and six were acquitted.

A despatch from Smyrna dated Ninth Month 20th, says: "There was a disastrous earthquake this morning at Aidin, a town on the Mender, eighty-one miles southeast of this place. Hundreds of persons were killed in the Valley of Menderez."

A despatch from Calcutta, dated Ninth Month 25th, says: "Earthquakes, floods and terrible landslides occurred at and near Darjeeling, in the lower Himalaya, last night. Great damage was done and no fewer than sixty natives perished. There was a rainfall of 28 inches in 38 hours. Three landslides took place between Darjeeling and Senada, involving the transhipment of a railw of passengers. According to the latest reports, ropean children and twenty natives were lost these two points."

The Japanese Government has decided to make tion compulsory in Japan, and that all children a vaccinated before they reach the age of ten month must be vaccinated when they are six and ag they are twelve years of age.

The Mexican Senate and Chamber of Deputies session, by a unanimous vote, granted to Presid twenty-one days' leave of absence to visit Chi despatch dated the 25th, states that President D not go to Chicago on account of the illness of and he has appointed Ignacio Mariscal, Minister of Relations, to go as his representative.

Instead of being it as one might suppose them to be, judg- m the general survey of the country, re often found winding around on the le of one swale, and perhaps on the west the next, or going along on the south this hill and on the north side of an- or wherever it is judged the draught made the lightest. Sometimes a fence e found placed across an old trail that ave been used for many years, by some who had recently "taken up a claim." h cases the old trail must be given up, new one made. The drivers and guides he prairies understand all these things, ey seem to have a remedy for each and hindrance.

ne instance our drivers, in order to make t cut to a village, drove through the ," where the young poplars as large as rm and ten or twelve feet high were wn by the neck yokes of the horses and they seemed to be as much at home going through the "brush" where there was no trail, at all, as they were in moving along in the trail on the open prairie.

All the trails of recent date are made by the driving of double teams, and all the wagons being of the narrow gauge pattern, the horses and wheels move along in nearly the same path. This arrangement seemed desirable, except where the soil was of a clayey nature, but in such places, immediately after a rain I noticed that the horses would slip more or less on the inclines, which made their travelling somewhat difficult.

The prevailing wood where we journeyed was white poplar and willow, mostly of a small growth, except on or near the rivers. This is owing to prairie fires. The "brush" grows for a few years, then it is killed by fire, and then it takes a fresh start again. We saw very little poplar away from the streams more than six inches through at the butt, and very little as large as even this.

Golden-rod was very plentiful, as was also dwarf sun-flower. In many places the prairies were yellow with it. In one field of oats which we passed, these flowers looked quite as prolific as they did in some other places out on the open prairie.

Birds and animals were numerous. Gophers appeared to be the most common. One would often see them just ahead of the horses running along in the trail, and on either side, bobbing their heads up and down. I hit one with my foot while walking along a path near a field of potatoes. We saw one badger, fat and sleek, only a few feet from our carriage.

Birds were quite plenty. Prairie hens and chickens were often seen on the wing. Hawks and crows were quite numerous, the former were often seen on the top of dead poplar trees. King-fishers were seen also, which shows that fish abound in the lakes and streams. Plovers were also quite plenty, and as we watched them in their flight, we were reminded of the lines of Sir Walter Scott.

> "More stately thy couch by this desert lake lying,
> Thy obsequies sung by the gray plover flying,
> With but one faithful friend to witness thy dying
> In the arms of Helvellyn and Catchedecam."

For the open prairie does look much like a great lake. Very often after we had left the "brush" and entered upon a stretch of open prairie where one has an unobstructed view for miles, did I hear Ignace Alamanoffsky exclaim "O beauty! O how beautiful!"

There were many wild ducks also seen upon the lakes and ponds which we passed. In one flock seen near Good Spirit Lake, it was estimated that there were more than five hundred. In one village we saw a young crane which had been tamed by the Dukhobors.

There is one crop which grows upon the prairies that is of great value to the Dukhobors, and which costs them nothing in labor to cultivate. This is the berry crop, which grows in abundance.

While at East Selkirk, we were told that during the strawberry season the Dukhobors, would pick about ten bushels of them per day. The season for these berries, however, was about over when we were there.

At that time they were picking saskatom and gooseberries. I saw several come into camp with eight or ten quarts each of these, which they sold at East Selkirk for about five cents per quart.

Red raspberries were also plenty.

In many places we saw quite a large number of women and children gathering these, and strawberries also, for the different villages visited beyond Yorkton, being so much farther north than East Selkirk, the strawberry season is later than at the former place. We were often supplied with both kinds of these berries by the Dukhobors, which was a great treat to us, and we always made it a point to leave something in return at each place as a full equivalent that may be more substantial to them than the berries.

On our first day out from Yorkton we saw a man near the trail, who held up a paper as though he wanted some information. Our driver stopped, and he was asked what was wanted. He handed us the paper, upon which was written in English, information to the effect, that a certain man whose name I have forgotten, had lost two horses and a colt, which the owner had heard nothing from for about a week.

The man proved to be a Russian, who could make his wants known to our interpreter. He wanted to reach a certain farmer living several miles away. Our driver happened to know where this man lived, so that by a little help from our driver and interpreter, the stranger was directed which trail to take, and he left us and went on his way, I doubt not with rejoicing. We were also glad to be able, in a small way, to assist a stranger in a strange land.

We reached Jacob Wurz's soon after midday, where we were kindly received, and as it had begun to rain, we were doubly glad that there were good roofs over us and our horses and carriages. After we had partaken of a substantial lunch, the rain had subsided, and we proceeded onward, reaching the first village of Dukhobors on White Sand River, late in the afternoon. Just before reaching this place, however, we saw not far away on the right of our trail, ten Dukhobor men mowing. The interpreter and I alighted and went to interview them, and the rest of our company drove on to the village.

All of these men were in Halifax last winter, and they all appeared glad to see me once more. Ignace Alamanoffsky told them that I was also a farmer, and had come two thousand miles or more to see them. They seemed grateful that one had come so far to visit them.

I tried one of their scythes, which are rather peculiar. They are about three feet in length and are attached to a stick which is perfectly straight, in the middle of which is fastened only one nib or handle. This is made by taking a stick about a foot and a half in length, having about half of its thickness cut out in the centre, and then bent around the scythe stick, and the ends fastened securely with a string. The first stroke or two I took with this novel mower seemed a little awkward; but I soon got used to the hang of the scythe, and had no trouble in cutting the grass, for the scythe was a keen one.

The Dukhobors have a novel way of sharpening these scythes, when dull. Instead of using a grindstone, they place them upon an anvil, and pound the edge with a small hammer. I saw one young man doing this out on the prairie where there were a number of men mowing. After the hammer has been applied, they use a whetstone, in the same way as a rifle is used. They keep their scythes apparently as sharp as though they were ground.

After leaving the hay field on our way towards the village, we saw a man plowing with three oxen, having two lads to drive them. Two of the oxen were yoked together and attached directly to the plow, while the third was harnessed somewhat like a horse, and put ahead of the others as a leader. One boy drove the yoke and the other the single ox. After holding the plow awhile we proceeded towards the west, to reach the village where we joined the rest of our party.

Previous accounts have sufficiently elaborated our crossing the Assiniboine River; but our journeyings along the Swan River are worthy of a more extended account. After reaching Swan River and partaking of our dinner somewhat after the middle of the day, our friends the Jews, to whom allusion has already been made, took leave of us, as they were quite anxious to reach a Jewish settlement a short distance north of Thunder Hill, and return to Yorkton before the end of the week. One of the men was president and the other secretary, of a fund called "The Baron de Hirsch Fund," the amount of which is $2,000,000 or more; the interest is to be given to Jews who settle in Canada. These people were taking some of the income of this fund to assist this colony of Jews. Before leaving they both expressed satisfaction in having joined our company, and we bade them farewell, desiring that they might be successful in performing the remaining portion of their journey.

This Dukhobor village is in two sections. The eastern portion contains eleven houses and one hundred and twenty-two persons; the western, about half a mile further up the river, through the "brush," contains eight houses and one hundred and two persons.

The interpreter and I went alone to this section, to give notice to the villagers of our visit, and that we would like as many of them as were desirous of so doing, to go back with us to the east section. Most of those who were at home and able to go, accompanied us on our return. Very soon there was quite a large gathering near one of their houses on the hillside. After an impressive season of silent waiting, E. H. V. appeared in supplication, "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." After she had finished, Ignace Alamanoffsky gave its interpretation, after which the Dukhobors, with tearful eyes, all bowed themselves to the earth.

Testimonies were then offered by E. H. V. and myself, which were interpreted in parts, that is a sentence or a few sentences at a time. These words also seemed to be received with grateful hearts, and we were made to rejoice in the Lord for all his benefits to the children of men.

Soon after the meeting closed, preparations were made for our crossing the Swan River. The regular place for fording the stream was a mile or two further down the river, and our drivers both thought that it would be almost impossible for their horses to draw the carriage up the steep bank on the other side; but the Dukhobors kindly offered their services, and removed all the goods from the wagons, then unhitched the horses and attached ropes to the empty wagons, and pulled them across the river and up the bank on the other side.

The drivers rode on horseback across the stream. The rest of our company and all our baggage that had been removed from the wagons were taken over on a raft of logs, made by the Dukhobors for such purposes. All was accomplished without accident, and our horses were saved two or three miles drive, by the kindness of our friends.

Quite a number of Dukhobors gathered on the south bank of the river, watching us as we were moving slowly over the water, and one might conclude by their animated countenances they were wishing us God speed.

THE CYPRUS DUKHOBORTSI IN CANADA.—PRESSING NEED.—A Russian woman writes: "Has —— written you about the desperate position of the Cyprus party in Canada? A week ago we received a letter. They had food only for two weeks, and nothing more but bread. If they do not have help they will starve. Scurvy is spreading among them. I cannot help crying, thinking about them and knowing nothing what to do! It is a heart-breaking story, all their emigration and immigration!"—London Friend.

FAULTFINDING.—"Charity covereth the multitude of sins." Faultfinding hunts for sore places, pulls off the old scabs, and exposes their ugliness. Faultfinders know exactly what other people ought to do, but never think of what they ought to do themselves. Charity rejoices over the good it discovers in others, and says nothing of the defects. Faultfinders see the defects of others and magnify and proclaim them, but say nothing of their virtues. Charity sees much good in the church and rejoices that it is doing so well. Faultfinders see only its shortcomings and defects and bemoan and lament its moral and spiritual decay. More charity and less faultfinding is what is needed in the home, the church, and the community. There is room for a great revival right here. It is to be feared that many, by making the gate into heaven so narrow for others, will find out at last that they have made it so narrow they cannot slip through themselves.—Religious Telescope.

rth Month 13th.—Arose from my bed morning feeling very unwell, and I was to apprehend that the time of my de-e might be near at hand, but through felt a little better toward meeting time, g First-day, so that I believed it would t for me to make an effort to get there, I did, and I thought it proved to be a d season and a solemn meeting. In the oon at half-past two o'clock attended a g at a Methodist meeting-house, ap-d on my account, in which I was favored o relieve my mind and the reward of peace followed. The canopy of heav-ve seemed to be spread over us in a re-ble degree. May all praise be ascribed lim who is the crown and diadem of all gathered assemblies.

h Month 22nd.—This evening at about r-five minutes past nine o'clock, our and brother, Isaac Clendenon, departed fe after a protracted illness, through at seasons, no doubt he suffered greatly, odily and mentally. It was a solemn period, in which all present seemed brought into stillness and the precious hope seemed to prevail, that through mercy and redeeming love, his spirit was prepared for an admittance into the haven of rest and peace. O, the great need that I see there is for us poor dependent finite mortals, to try and strive daily, whilst favored with health and ability, to prepare for our latter end, seeing we know not the day nor the hour, when we may be called hence to be seen of men no more.

Seventh Month 6th.—Such have been my feelings of poverty and nothingness of late, that I have felt as if I hardly dare record anything relating to my spiritual condition, but for the sake of my dear children, and those whom I am likely to leave behind, still on the stage of action, I again venture to leave a little record, and may say that at our meeting to-day, First-day, I apprehend that I felt called upon to deliver close doctrine in regard to indulging in the vain pastimes and amusements of the present day, as being very offensive in the sight of our All-merciful Heavenly Father, bringing to our remembrance the language of the Apostle, "whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God," in which I felt peaceful, which I esteem a great favor. May all praise be given to the Author of all good.

Eighth Mo. 21st.—A few weeks ago, whilst sitting in our meeting on First-day, language like this took deep hold of my mind, "Watchman, what of the night," accompanied with a desire to understand what the meaning of it might be, which I thought might be applicable to myself, and a fear arose that I have not, at all times, been as watchful to the pointings of the Master as I ought to be, feeling as though I am set as a watchman, as it were, over our little flock in the dark and cloudy night. Feelings of deep poverty attend me at this season.

Ninth Mo. 7th, 1884.—Yesterday attended the funeral of a little infant boy, which was a solemn season to my mind, and herein is again verified the truth of the language of the poet,

"From death's arrest no age is free,
Young children too may die."

Our blessed Saviour said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." But my mind seemed solemnly impressed with the fear at least, that too few of us are sufficiently prepared to lead them to Christ, that He might put his hand upon them and bless them. Too many, no doubt are dressing and adorning them in that way that may have a tendency to lead them away from Him into the vanities of the world, causing sorrow to the rightly exercised mind.

ABIDE in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me (John xv: 4). From moment to moment, and from hour to hour, the inner nature of man is to be continuously sustained with the life of God, and only as I am constantly receiving his fulness into my emptiness am I really living in the true, full, deep sense of the word, that life of eternity, which is my privilege now, and will be my glory hereafter.—Hay Aitken.

OVERCOME evil with good.

The Value of Cornstalks.

Six different commodities are now being manufactured from cornstalks—namely, cellulose, worth four hundred dollars a ton, used by the Government as an automatic hole-stopper for battleships, excellent cardboard, a fine grade of paper, an unequalled foundation for dynamite, a patent cattle food and a superior glue.

The value of cellulose lining for warships is well known. When a leak develops the cellulose swells in such a manner as automatically to close it. With fifteen tons of stalks, worth ninety dollars, one ton of such cellulose is made, for which, as already stated, the Government is now paying at the rate of four hundred dollars a ton. Two factories—one in Rockford, Ill., and another in Owensboro, Ky.—are now making cornstalk cellulose, together with other products of less value. As respects the cornstalk cattle food, it is stated that the stalks when ground to a coarse meal, cooked, sweetened with molasses, and pressed into cakes, form one of the most nutritive and valuable foods yet placed on the market. The absorptive power of cellulose dust fits it admirably for the manufacture of dynamite by mixing with nitroglycerine, such dust being superior even to guncotton. Five factories, says the New York Commercial, are to be at once erected in addition to those already in operation. The more the better. It is the good fortune of the proposed combine that it will, if successful, have for its object to enlarge, or, in fact, create an industry, not to stifle it.—Baltimore Sun.

PARENTS make a great mistake, when they toil and grind, scrimp and save, in order that their children may begin where they leave off. It is necessity that develops the wings with which to fly the lofty heights. This shutting out of your life all the light and beauty of the world, to flood theirs from the beginning, is to make a wide difference between you, which often produces bitter sorrow, even if it does not bring them failures or a dwarfing of their powers. If life gives them ease and comfort without effort, there are nine chances in ten that no effort will be made and hence no true growth in character. Rather make them understand that they must be the architects of their own lives, and that difficulties make the ladder by which they may the higher climb.—The Riverside.

SHORT ON CAMPHOR.—There appears to be some danger of the world's getting hard up for the old lady's remedy for everything—camphor. Large quantities of the drug are consumed in the manufacture of celluloid, which is now largely used as a substitute for tortoise shell, ivory, and horn. This has increased the demand and raised the price. Camphor is produced from several trees which differ in their habits, while other trees closely related to them, do not produce the drug. Nearly all that is raised in Europe or America is exported from China or Japan. A species of tree in Borneo produces camphor of a very high order, which sells for eighty times the price of the common article. It is nearly all used in China, where it is esteemed as an incense. The trees from which camphor is produced grow slowly, and unless efforts are made to protect them future generations will have little camphor.

FEEDING.

"Thy words were found and I did eat them" (Jer xv: 16)

The Word made flesh, self-styled the Bread of Life
With open peace rewards the secret strife
Of those who count his sayings not too hard
To hear, but to the substance have regard.
Living by Him in whom all things consist,
In his campaign they inwardly enlist;
They find his rations in each work they do,
And more complete devotion still pursue.
As self-existence is no dream of theirs,
Their sole successes are successful prayers,
Thankful recipients from the Source of good,
Communing over every kind of food,
From sphere to sphere their struggling hands they raise Till prayer's obscurer light is lost in praise.

Stephen Grellet and the Emperor Alexander of Russia.

It is very humbling and wonderful to me how the Lord has opened a way in these nations where I saw none at all; truly the promise "the Lord will provide" has been fulfilled in a remarkable manner; and besides, a door, towards the further labors of love that may be required of us in this Empire is now open, so far, at least, as this can be effected by the good will of the Emperor; but to the Lord alone we must look to give us an entrance into the hearts of those we may visit, to send forth his help to us, and his blessing on our feeble efforts to advocate his blessed Truth. May He strengthen us to plead with our fellow-men to turn to Christ, from darkness to light, and from the power of sin to himself.

15th. Prince Alexander Galitzin sent us a message last evening that the Empress Elizabeth, the wife of the Emperor, wished to see us this forenoon, if we could possibly spare a little of our time to her. We were very closely engaged, but the religious feeling I had towards her five years since when at Carlsruhe, was still with me and the prospect of our departure without having seen her, seemed like leaving something undone, therefore we readily accepted the invitation. We went to the palace this morning, and she received us in her private apartment in a very modest manner, even apologizing for her request to us to come to see her; she had for some time wished for such an interview, but had been fearful to propose it; what she had heard of my visit at Carlsruhe made her regret not to have seen me there, and now, what the Emperor had told her of us induced her to request this visit. Her heart was tender, and prepared of the Lord to receive what, in his love and counsel, we felt to be our religious duty to impart to her; she was bathed in tears. From what she told us, it is evident that Jesus, the Saviour, is precious, to her; she is of a retired character, is seldom seen in public, when she can avoid it; her dress generally is very simple; when she goes out she has only a plain two horse carriage, with the simple cipher E. upon it; whereas all the nobles have generally four horses to their equipages; the Emperor's mother has six. The Empress Elizabeth told us how frequently she envied the humble station in life of those maidens who carry the milk about St. Petersburg, in order that she might live in privacy and religious retirement, which she has not in her power to do now. This has been a very satisfactory visit.

On another occasion the Prince Alexander Galitzin gave us several more interesting particulars respecting the dear Emperor; among others, the peculiar circumstances attending the renewing of those religious impressions that of latter years have been an abiding nature with him. When the information was received at Petersburg that the armies of Napoleon had entered Moscow, a general panic came upon the inhabitants, and they packed up their valuables to take their flight into some more secure place; for they expected the French would soon march for that city. The Emperor was preparing to go with a body of troops to oppose them. Prince Alexander Galitzin had at that time many men employed in repairing his palace, which he continued calmly to go on with, whilst so many others were panic-stricken. Some envious persons told the Emperor what he was doing, and that he must be a traitor. He went to the Prince and queried, "Galitzin what are you doing? what means all this? every one prepares to flee, and you are building?" "Oh," said the Prince, "I am here in as sure a place of safety as any I could flee to; the Lord is my defence, in Him I trust." "Whence have you such confidence?" replied the Emperor, "who assures you of it?" "I feel it in my heart" answered the Prince, "and it is also stated in the Divinely inspired volume"—holding forth the Bible to the Emperor. By some inadvertent motion of the hand the Bible fell upon the floor—open. "Well, permit me, said the Prince, to read to you in that very place on which the Bible lies open before us." It was the ninety-first Psalm; on hearing which the Emperor stood for a while astonished. The army, during that time was marching out of the city. It is the usual practice on such occasions, or when the Emperor is to be absent for a length of time, that the last place he leaves is their great Church. He repaired there; the portion of Scripture read on the occasion was again the ninety-first Psalm. The Emperor sent for the priest, and queried, "who told you to make choice of that particular passage of Scripture this day?" He replied "that nobody had done it, but that he had desired in prayer that the Lord would direct him to that particular portion of the inspired volume he should read, to encourage the Emperor, and that he apprehended that Psalm was the word of the Lord to him."

The Emperor proceeded some distance on his way; and late in the evening he felt his mind under great seriousness and desired that the Bible should be read to him. When the person who came in for that purpose began, he also read the ninety-first Psalm. The Emperor interrupting him, queried "who told you to read this? has Galitzin told you?" He replied that he had not seen the Prince, nor had any one told what to read; but on being told he was sent for to read to the Emperor from the Bible, he had desired that the Lord would direct him to what was most appropriate for the occasion, and accordingly he had selected this portion of Scripture. The Emperor felt astonished at this, and paid the greater attention to what was read, believing that this must be of the Lord's ordering; he was therefore very solemnly and tenderly impressed, and from that time he concluded morning and evening, to read privately a chapter in the Bible.

THERE never was a good war or a bad peace.

For the Master's Use.

A PARABLE.

The writing-desk lay open. Its owner been called away in the act of beginnin important letter. On it were laid a she note-paper and an envelope; beside it s the ink-bottle, and close by lay a pen, the ting-paper, and the pen-wiper.

The silence of the room was broken low, rustling sound. It was the Note-p speaking to his companions.

"You needn't look so consequential," it scornfully: "it is on me the letter wil written."

"Yes," said the Pen; but you forget it who write it."

"And you forget," said the Ink, "that couldn't write without me."

"You needn't boast," said the Ink-bo "for where would you be only that I hold safe?"

"It is ridiculous of you all to be so ceited," interposed the Blotting-paper. " for me what a mess you would all be in."

"And may I ask," said the Envelope, "w would be the use of any of you if I did cover the letter, bear the direction, and it safely where it is to go?"

"But it is I who write the direction on y snapped the Pen.

"And I! And I!" screamed they all.

"Dear sirs, please stop quarrelling," ge said the little Pen-wiper, who had not spo yet.

"What have you to say?" asked the contemptuously. "You are nothing but a d mat." And he laughed at his own wit.

"Even if I am only a door-mat," said Pen-wiper, humbly, "only for me you woul so rough with dried ink you couldn't be And that is all any of us are good for—ju be used. "I believe he's right," said the Envelop Note-paper together.

"Indeed, yes; and I'm sure I beg you don, Pen-wiper, for calling you a doo We must work together to be of use," sa Pen in a very humble voice.

"Please don't mention it," said the Pen-wiper, blushing a deeper crimson; " do think we would all be happier if we just do our own part of the work the bes we can, without being jealous or try make little of each other."

As he spoke, their owner re-entere room, and silence fell. The Pen was tak dipped into the Ink, and passed to and the Note-paper, the Blotting-paper pres it, the letter placed in the Envelope, t dress written, the Pen wiped on the Pen

War and Peace Notes.

The war, and this is true of all wars, has encouraged the spirit of prodigality in national expenditures in directions aside from the conduct of the struggle, so that the grand footings show that the United States has become one of the most expensively governed countries on the globe. The enormous sums appropriated by the British government on national debt account for annuities to the royal family, for navy and for the army, for the multitudinous necessities for the mother country and for the defence of its colonies scattered throughout the world are represented by figures which fall far below the exhibit made by the Fifty-fifth Congress. A comparison of the present cost of running the British government with that which has been incurred by the United States shows the pace at which we are going and emphasizes the necessity of practicing close economies in our national housekeeping. The total expenditures of the British government for the two years ending April 1, 1897 and 1898 were nearly $1,022,063,315. Nor has Great Britain been on a peace footing strictly speaking during the period. The campaign in the Soudan has been costly and the protection of British interest in other parts of the world is constantly imposing heavy expense upon the country. The republic, by virtue of the duty and the necessity which the war placed upon it, has spent millions in extraordinary expenditure, from which there was no way of escape after the war was inevitable. The situation which the Fifty-fifth Congress faced was thus far exceptional, but it ought to have enforced frugality and parsimony in dealing with other than war appropriations, where common prudence dictated such a course. —Quoted in Glen Mills Daily.

How Militarism Increases Taxes.—John D. Rockefeller pays a tax in this country of $6,000. In Germany his tax would have to be over a hundred times as much on the same property and income or $650,000. John Jacob Astor, who pays $5000 in America, would pay in Germany $250,000 and in England $166,000. Pierpont Morgan and others who pay $420 in America, would pay $50,000 in Germany and $33,000 in England.

The Surrender of Conscience.

"Captain, what do you think," I asked,
"Of the part your soldiers play?"
The captain answered, "I do not think—
I do not think—I obey."

"Do you think you should shoot a patriot down,
And help a tyrant slay?"
The captain answered, "I do not think—
I do not think—I obey."

"Do you think that your conscience was meant to die.
And your brains to rot away?"
The captain answered, "I do not think—
I do not think—I obey."

While we cannot agree that obedience is essentially unmanly, the unmanly tendency of the obedience required of a soldier, is that it is forced and unreasoning obedience. It absolutely ignores individual conscience, and reduces men as far as possible to the condition of a machine. Is this manliness?—The Interchange.

"The Book of Heaven."

Egerton R. Young, once a missionary to the Indians in the far northern wilderness of British America, tells in one of his addresses this touching story:

"Often have I been ashamed of the littleness of my love by the devotion of these Indians, and by their love for the Bible. Let me give you an incident. One of our Indians with his son came away down from the distant hunting-grounds to fish on the shores of our great lakes. This man and his son came down to fish, and they made splendid fisheries, put up the whitefish on a staging where the foxes and wolves could not reach them, and one night the father said, 'My son, we leave to-morrow morning early; put the book of heaven in your pack; we go back one hundred and forty miles to our distant hunting-ground to join the mother and the others in the wigwam home.' So the young man put his Bible in his pack that he might take it home. Later on, along came an uncle, and said to the young man, 'Nephew, lend me the book of heaven, that I may read a little; I have loaned mine.' So the pack was opened, and the Bible was taken out, and the man read for a time, and then threw the Bible back among the blankets and went out.

"The next morning the father and son started very early on their homeward journey. They strapped on their snow-shoes and walked seventy miles, dug a hole in the snow at night, and had prayers and lay down and slept. The next morning, bright and early, after prayers, they pushed on and made seventy miles more, and reached home. That night the father said to his son, 'Give me the book of heaven, that the mother and the rest may read its word and have prayers.' As the son opened the pack, he said, 'Uncle asked for the book two nights ago, and it was not put back.' The father was disappointed, but said little. The next morning he rose early, put a few cooked rabbits in his pack, and away he started. He walked that day seventy miles, and reached the camp where he and his son had stopped two nights before. The next day he had made the other seventy miles, and reached the lake, and found his Bible in his brother's wigwam. The next morning he started again, and, walking in the two days one hundred and forty miles, was back at home once more. That Indian walked on snow-shoes two hundred and eighty miles through the wild forest of the Northwest to regain his copy of the Bible."

Samuel Capper's Visit.

I returned home to Bristol the early part of the ensuing week, about the fourth of Eighth Month, and remained at home during the winter and spring. In this interval, having reason to believe that some friends in Ireland would be very glad to find that the concern was abandoned, and that they spoke very decidedly of their want of unity with it, on account of the danger they apprehended; I thought it proper to bring the consideration of the matter again before my own Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, which I did, but no discouragement was offered to my resuming the prosecution of my engagement in the ensuing summer.

In the Fifth Month, 1842, I attended as a representative, the Meeting of Ministers and Elders in London, where upon the reading of my certificate and its endorsement, I obtained leave of that meeting to absent myself from its latter sittings, in order that I might proceed immediately to Ireland, to recommence the holding of meetings of the same description as before.

I proceeded from London to Birmingham the seventeenth of Fifth Month, accompanied from thence by my relative, John Cadbury, through Liverpool and Dublin to Limerick, where we arrived on the twenty-sixth of the same month.

On the journey from London to Birmingham I was favored with some solemn reflections, and though they tended to confirm me in the great weakness and infirmity which encompass me, yet I was not without a cheering and sustaining assurance, that whatever of suffering, humiliation or severe trial might await us, particularly through a portion of discouragement on the part of those who may not be able to unite with our views, yet that the great name and power of the Redeemer will be exalted, and his kingdom in some small degree spread, and if so we may be truly thankful for all that befals us. In passing through the various towns on our way from Dublin to Limerick, it was a great comfort to see, as we were able clearly to do, that the present depressed state of trade, has not affected Ireland, as it would have done had it not been for the exertions of Theobald Mathews—the effects produced by his great extension of sober habits, look where one will even in the liberties of Dublin and also in Limerick in the English and Irish towns, and we have pretty thoroughly traversed them, we scarcely see a squalid, half-starved person, no, not even a child; they look much superior to the same class of persons in England, as respects both health and comfort, though it is true that their habitations are, many of them, wretched, and their domestic accommodations poor; yet they are wonderfully changed as to cleanliness, and I think the intelligence of their countenances is improved considerably by this change.

It may be worthy of notice that some circumstances which arose during the late visit of Sarah Squires to the city of Limerick, occasioned a very virulent attack upon Friends and their principles by a high Church of England minister, to whom Friends gave, as I think, a calm and dignified answer, but he afterwards manifested in several letters, which he put in the public papers, so bitter and rancorous a spirit, that various persons, Protestants and Romanists, took it up and justified Friends' doctrines and practices. This epistolary war brought Friends very conspicuously before the public, and tended probably to give our proceedings an importance they might not otherwise have obtained in the eyes of the people. Seventh-day we had two long interviews with Friends, in which we were sympathized with, and I believe that some who were willing to help forward the work, were too backward to express that willingness, and the two or three who more fully entered into the matter, were very cautious of appearing forward, lest they should be considered over zealous, and too public spirited, this last quality being at a great discount in Ireland, and, indeed, instead of being kept in due bounds, is wholly discouraged, as inconsistent with true Quaker principles, a contrast with the conduct of George Fox, Wm. Penn, Isaac Penington, etc. This feeling has produced lamentable effects in this land, indeed, every aberration from the guidance of the Spirit of Truth, produces weakness and prejudice. I think that Limerick is rather less injured by this source of formality and apathy than some other places.

The morning meeting on the twenty-second with Friends was an opportunity in which I believe a little of the bread convenient for those present was broken and dispensed, in a sense, on my part, of unmixed dependence on Divine guidance, and clothed with poverty of spirit. After meeting we had a long consultation or conference, I think nearly two hours, on our intended movements, which certainly excited great alarm amongst Friends, and we had patiently to endure much discouraging feeling on the subject.

For the meeting in the evening in the meeting-house thirteen hundred notices were delivered over the city, chiefly among the less influential and affluent portion of the inhabitants, and we had an attendance of about one hundred and twenty men and fifty women, which I understood was more than Friends expected. The subject that opened upon my mind was love, as exemplified in the government of God, the coming of Christ, the interchange of the offices of fellowship between Christians, but especially displayed in the gift of the Comforter, the Spirit of Truth as our guide and support. I felt it a very solemn opportunity; in a few there was a disposition to lightness, but there were many solid minds present, some of whom evinced emotions of solid feelings and tenderness.

We held a meeting under the tent at six o'clock on Second-day evening, the twenty-third. This meeting seems to have encouraged Friends much. It was very quiet, with about four hundred persons present. I believe if it were not for the priests we might have had very large attendances in this country. The people seemed very anxious to attend, but as they told John Cadbury, who stood at the entrance, "We dare not come in for fear of the clergy." The opportunity was short but relieving to me; those in the tent were very attentive, and a great solemnity prevailed. At the time I felt it doubtful, when the priests were aware of it, whether we should be able to get many of their flocks, as they call the people. It is very clear that they will al do what they can to oppose a mode of teac which would render themselves valueless. was agreed on all hands that such a mee could not have been hoped for, before the perance reformation had made the progre has. The Friends here were disposed to e cheerfully into the engagement, after meeting. Another public meeting was he the same place, on Third-day evening; it pr to be another quiet and good meeting, out annoyance from the priest, and eq large or larger.

We had, as far as I could judge, a hea solemn and quiet meeting on the twenty- under the tent in Watts foundry yard, town, and I think others also felt it to blessed opportunity, in which the power o love of Christ reached the people's m There was a slight interruption by a m little out of his mind, yet the stillness a wards was truly admirable in which the ing broke up. There were about four hun present.

el Harris writes in "Present Day Papers" to the accompanying quotation of McGif- tory of the Church in Apostolic Times, owing very fine summary of what we learn g Christian worship from the directions for its regulation in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, might very well be printed, along with a similar passage in Neander's Church History, as a Friend's Tract for the Times."

This is the quotation. The italics are J. R. Harris's:

"Whoever had a psalm, or a teaching, or a revelation, or a tongue, received it from the Spirit, and when he communicated it to his brethren, it was accepted as a Divine and not as a mere human utterance. It is in the light of this fact that the freedom which characterized the Corinthian services must be interpreted. That freedom seems at first to have been complete. The confinement of the right to participate, to a certain class or certain regularly appointed individuals, was evidently quite unknown. Every Christian had the right to take such part as he wished, and the woman's right was equal to the man's. But the recognition of that right was not due to the Corinthian's recognition of the equality of all believers; it was due to their reverence for the Spirit of God. A disciple had the right to take part in the services, not because he was a Christian possessed of equal privileges with his brethren, but simply because he was an organ of the Spirit, and it was the Spirit's will that he should speak. Unless the Spirit prompted him he had no right whatever. And hence the freedom which is so characteristic a mark of the services as they appear in Paul's Epistle was, after all, decidedly limited. There was freedom for the Spirit, not for men as men."

Dr. McGiffert is said to have written the above without comprehending that there is a body of Christians in America to-day that holds the same principle in regard to worship that he has so vividly described as a feature of the early Church—The Interchange.

A CAMDEN QUAKER MEETING.

A. ELLEN WOODY.

There were only two or three of us
Who came to that place of prayer—
Came in a driving snow-storm,
But for that we did not care,
Since in that silence our hearts had risen,
And prayers for his Spirit said,
The Master himself was present there
And gave the "living bread."

We knew his promise to meet "the few;"
The thought made us glad and free,
We felt his touch when our heads we bowed;
We heard his "Wait on me."
Nobody saw Him lift the latch,
And none unbarred the door;
But peace was his token to every heart,
And why need we ask for more?

And yet to the open-hearted
He gives food to be handed on,
And there came to our midst ere we parted
A stranger to the house of prayer;
And softly the Spirit whispered,
Into the ears of the three,
A message for the wayward brother,
'Twas the Master's "Come to me."

Oh, how warmed were our hearts that morning,
In that quiet house of prayer,
Outside were cold and sin and mourning,
But the Lord himself was there;
He came to redeem the pledge He gave,
Wherever his loved ones be,
To stand himself in the midst of them,
Though they count but two or three.

Notes from Others.

If the pulpit has lost much of its old time authority, as is often complained, it is due less to the growing irreligion of the laity than to the growing secularization of the pulpit.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

In 1852 a vessel was wrecked on the island Ephati. Every one of the crew was killed and eaten by the savages inhabiting the island. In 1898 another vessel was wrecked there with a hundred and twenty on board. They were all rescued. Thirty were taken to one village, thirty to another, and so on about the island. They were sheltered and fed for six months, until, another vessel arriving, they were kindly provided with safe passage. What had wrought the change? The Christian religion. —Ex.

A recent observer has noted, that as a religion (that is, a denomination) becomes older it tends to become more careful as to its orthodoxy, and less careful as to its morality. In other words, it becomes more careful to have a correct formula. A denomination like Friends, which is now well into its third century of existence, needs to consider this statement, and to see to it that it be careful on the one hand to have firm hold on Truth, and, on the other, to let the natural result of its faith show itself in right living. A distinction has been made between religion and morality; but either without the other is weak and ineffective.—The Interchange.

Says the British Medical Journal: "The piano has been the cause teterrima of quarrels that have sundered ancient friendships; it has wrecked many enterprises of great pith and moment; it has disturbed the finer adjustments of the cerebral machinery in many literary and scientific workers, has driven studious men from their books to the bottle and has stimulated peaceful citizens to the commission of violent crimes. These are among the evil effects of the piano considered passive, as the schoolman would say—from the point of view of the sufferer. But the operator does not come off scathless. A recent writer, Dr. Watezhodi, thinks that the chlorosis and neuroses from which so many many young girls suffer may be largely attributed to the abuse of the piano. He therefore urges that the "deadly" custom of compelling young girls to hammer on the keyboard before they are fifteen or sixteen years of age should be proscribed by public opinion. Even at that age the exercise should be permitted only to those who, in addition to real talent, possess a robust constitution."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The cruiser Olympia, with Admiral Dewey on board, anchored inside Sandy Hook at 7.30 o'clock on the morning of the 26th ult., two days ahead of the time expected. On the 29th, the greatest naval parade ever seen in New York took place, and on the 30th a land parade, unsurpassed theretofore. On the 2nd the Admiral went to Washington where he was received by the President.

In his opening address as President of Cornell University, delivered Ninth Month 28th, Professor Schurman said: "I was often asked in the Philippines if our civil service was better than that of Spain. Here is a point where the Filipinos suspect and fear us. We must allay their anxiety and suspicion by a splendid Philippine civil service. I believe we shall. It is absolutely necessary. But there will be no harder task in connection with our government of the archipelago. I repeat, however, that the success of our administration in the Philippines will depend upon the men we send out to conduct it much more than upon the acts of Congress or any other circumstance. What is the end of colonization? Why should we extend our sovereignty over remote countries and alien peoples? I answer that the only justifiable object of such expansion is the establishment of good government in the territory annexed, the elevation of its people in civilization and the training of them in progressive self government, with a view to ultimate independence whether by partnership in, or separation from, the sovereign State. As the end for the moral being is perfection, and the end for the economic society is wealth, so the end for the political community is independence. In the Divine education of the race no people can be permanently kept in a state of subjection to, or even dependence upon, another people. Of all colonizing nations England is the only one which has realized this great principle; and it took a successful rebellion in her first empire to impress the truth even upon England. Her great self governing colonies—Canada and Australia—are now ready for independence; and, if they are not to realize it by separation, an equal place must be found for them, beside England, Scotland and Ireland, in some great plan of imperial federation. And if India, instead of being, as it is, the mere meeting place of innumerable races, were a single national organism and began to breathe a national life, England should no longer desire to preserve her Indian empire. Indeed, she could not if she would, for her native army would desert, and the unified peoples, animated by the sentiment of nationality, would drive out the foreigners with whom resistance could only mean financial ruin and ultimate surrender."

The United States Government receipts during Ninth Month were $45,344,144, and the expenditures $37,579,372, a surplus for the month of $7,764,772.

To-day more than 80 per cent. of the cost of running this Government is caused by wars, past, present and prospective.

The foreign commerce of the United States during the Eighth Month was the most profitable in the history of the country.

The postal money order business between the United States and Canada amounts to $80,000 a week.

Discussing the cause of the large increase in the price of steel that has taken place during the last six months, an official of the Navy Department, whose duties have identified him with the purchase of large quantities of steel for the navy, said to a correspondent of the Baltimore Sun: "One of the causes why steel has advanced is the shutting down of the Cuban mines during the war, from which large quantities of high class pig iron were taken and brought to this country for the manufactories. Canada also shipped quantities of steel to this country, and a considerable lot was imported from Spain before the relation between the two Governments became strained. Pig iron is now quoted at 3 cents a pound, whereas one year ago it was much less than a cent a pound. There is not a large steel manufactory in this country which has not more work than it can handle, and thousands of tons are being shipped monthly abroad. Russia is buying practically all the steel rails for the Trans-Siberian Railway from this country, and a large part of the rolling stock is also being furnished here. There is far more steel bought here by English firms than is imagined, and, in fact, nearly all Continental Powers are also coming to us for it. Another reason that may be assigned for the advance is the general extension of the railroad system and the introduction of steel freight cars for the wooden ones. Only in the last year or two have these cars been built, and I predict that within five years nearly all roads will have substituted them for the type now used. The larger firms are compelled to decline work, and I am informed that recently one of these firms offered a local railroad company here $50,000 to be relieved of executing a contract for furnishing steel rails that was made prior to the rise in price. The firm saw that if this contract was annulled, it could afford to accept new contracts under the present steel prices and at considerable advantage."

FOREIGN.—Europe, with a population of over 366,400,000, has over 21,000,000 men ready for her armies in case of war.

In the year 1800 the approximate area of the British Empire was 2,012,182 square miles. In 1899 the approximate area of the empire had grown to 12,596,608 square miles, and the population to 414,410,000.

It seems that one in 1,000 of the people of Scotland die from old age, and the Registrar General's report, just issued, shows that in 1897 the death roll of Scotland included eighteen centenarians. He mentions that at ages between 95 and 100 years 41 men and 100 women died, while 4 of the former sex and 14 of the latter were 100 or over at death, viz: six women were 100 years, one man and two women were 101, one man and one woman 102, two women 103, one man 104, two women 105, while one man and one woman were returned as being 107 years of age at death.

At a depth of twenty-seven feet a curious discovery was made recently, a Berlin paper says, on the island of Gothland—the skeletons of several knights in full armor seated on their horses. Archæologists think they date back to the ninth century.

Details received at Constantinople of the recent earthquakes in Asia Minor show that about 1,500 persons perished, several villages being destroyed.

Nornin has fallen recently in the vicinity of Darjeeling, in the lower Himilaya, where on Ninth Month 24th great damage was wrought and many persons were killed by earthquakes, floods and landslides. Several other landslides occurred later. The Phool Bazaar was completely overwhelmed and 200 persons lost their lives. At Tamsongbustee 21 bodies have been recovered, and it is believed that twenty other persons perished. At Darjeeling 100 fatalities occurred. Landslides have also occurred at Murmeh, and there, too, several were killed. Famine prices are being demanded for food in parts of India devastated by recent earthquakes and floods.

The American authorities at Manila have refused to permit Spanish vessels to go to insurgent ports to bring away Spanish prisoners, holding that those ports are closed and that the prisoners must be put on board American vessels.

On Ninth Month 26th General Otis cabled that General Snyder attacked the position of the insurgents five miles west of Cebu, and destroyed seven forts and a number of smooth bore cannon. The insurgents were utterly routed, and Snyder returned with his force to Cebu.

The great Siberian Railway is to be rebuilt even before it is completed. The reason is the enormous increase in the business of the road. The mineral resources of Western Siberia are vast. Between Tomsk and Kooznesk lie 60,000 square kilometres (23,167 square miles) of coal lands, which have never been touched.

The area of the Transvaal is 120,000 square miles, or about the same size as the combined areas of the States of Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Connecticut and Vermont.

The great "Witwatersrand" gold fields of South Africa, located in the South African republic are better known as the Johannesburg mines. The Dutch word, "Witwatersrand," means, literally, "White Water Range," and the strip of territory, a few hundred miles long and a few miles in width, to which it is applied was but a few years ago considered a nearly worthless ridge, useful only for the pasturage of cattle and sheep, and for even this comparatively valueless. In 1883, however, gold was discovered, and in 1884 the value of the gold production was about $50,000. It increased with startling rapidity, the production of 1888 being about $5,000,000, and that of 1890, $10,000,000; 1892, over $20,000,000; 1895, over $40,000,000, and 1897 and 1898 about $55,000,000 in each year. Recent discoveries lead to the belief that these wonderfully rich mines are the long lost "gold of Ophir" from which Solomon obtained his supplies.

Tribe of the Israel of the Prince of Peace.

"They are not all Israel who are of Israel" physical descent, and so we reckon as the e Israel of God all of any name who, in the h that was Abraham's, now "live by the h of the Son of God, who loved us and gave self for us."

Such in their general spirit, and in a remark- y practical proof, seem to be the community Dukhobors; who, 7500 in number, having aped from their Pharaoh who had tardily rd the words, "Let my people go," wit- sed the sea opened, by the ministration of ends, for their passage to a strange shore, have been left in the middle of a vast tinent and of a short summer, that could rcely yield the beginning of sustenance for great a multitude.

There they stand, remote from other popula- ns, in a land already stiffening with its six nths' freezing; and when presently two eks' prospect of bread is exhausted, starva- n is said to stare some of the villages in the e, unless manna descend upon them from ven through our hands.

Shall half of this modern Israel of Peace ish during the coming winter through indif- ence of the Friends of Peace? It is deemed judicious minds that such must be the rate heir perishing, unless we of our superfluity ist in unto the offerings of God." A living portunity is now laid at our door to prove ore all coming history how much our sincer- for the cause of peace is worth in dollars l cents. Inasmuch as we obediently do it for willing martyrs and supporters of the cause, do it unto the Prince of Peace himself.

Should but a pound of corn meal per day each Dukhobor be furnished to sustain life another summer, it is estimated that some ,000 would be needed to cover the cost. that alone, for a uniform diet in the rigors of a Canadian winter, many must fail to exist. If for the famine stricken Porto Ricans fifteen dollars is pronounced necessary to tide over each in the warmth of a tropical clime when its fruits are soon to appear, how much greater should be the estimate for the frost-bound "Christians of the Universal Brotherhood?" But even that rate applied to our brethren in the north would exceed one hundred thousand dollars. So we in our ceiled houses will not be hurt by denying ourselves some superfluous article of food, some needless addition to apparel or furnishing, to pass its value over to the famishing army of Peace. It will not hurt us, if need be, to suffer physically with the suffering seed.

We sometimes look upon each red stamp that we spend on a bank check—a tax imposed by war—with the sad confession, "It is the price of blood." For every two cents which the demon of War extorts, shall we not assign at least an equal tribute to the Prince of Peace? If by the professed Friends of Peace throughout our land the stamp tax were repeated to save the lives of these Christian standard-bearers, the amount would go far in tiding them over to a season of self-support.

Such are some of the reflections resulting from an attendance of the recent meeting of Friends in their Arch Street house to consider this matter of momentous responsibility. We give to our readers in the present number the address of our friend Charles Rhoads, as a valuable summary of the history, exodus, and present situation of the Dukhobors.

It is hoped that the sub-committees invited by the Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings will meet with a warm response in a house-to-house solicitation of aid in any form of value, whether money or goods, throughout the limits of their respective Monthly Meetings. But the distress is so imminent that many should send in their offerings of relief without waiting to be called on by a committee.

ON THE PRESENT AND PROSPECTIVE NEEDS OF THE DUKHOBORS.

Address read at a Public Meeting of Friends and others in Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, Tenth Month 5th, 1899, by Charles Rhoads.

The call for the present assembly is occasioned by the conviction on the part of the committee of the Meeting for Sufferings of Friends of Philadelphia, who were charged some months ago with the care of raising funds to aid the Russian emigrants to Canada, known as the Dukhobortsi, that the members of our Society have a peculiar duty to perform, in assisting these people to tide over a critical period, following their introduction into North America, until they can become self-sustaining. There are about seven thousand of them now in the eastern part of the province of Assiniboia and the western district of the province of Manitoba, in the Dominion of Canada, where the Canadian Government has assigned them two hundred and seventy-six thousand four hundred and eighty acres of land, being one hundred and sixty acres to each adult. A part of them arrived there in the Sixth Month last, but others not until a month or more later; consequently there was not sufficient time left in that Northern climate (about fifty degrees) to plant and perfect crops or cereals; and the potatoes planted by those who first came were injured by an untimely frost in the latter part of the Seventh Month.

The contributions so liberally made heretofore by English Friends (about seventy-five thousand dollars), have been entirely consumed by the cost of transporting these people from the Black Sea to Canada, and feeding them on the voyage. The funds donated by Friends here and those given by the Mennonites, amounting to over ten thousand dollars, have been expended in sustaining them after their arrival, and providing oxen for farm labor, with wagons, tools, seed, etc.

The situation that now confronts them is, that ten months more must elapse before their farming will result in ripened crops for their sustenance, during which but little profitable labor can be done for wages, owing to the sparsely settled country they occupy, and the severe weather with snow, which prevails in that region.

These facts form a strong appeal to Friends to make some sacrifices, to save them from starvation and suffering, meantime. Their religious principles and testimonies coincide remarkably with ours in regard to war, the spirituality of Divine worship, and avoidance of all ritual ceremonies in its performance; patience under injuries, and love to mankind. They are industrious, frugal and temperate in their habits; and if placed in favorable circumstances for prosperity in outward affairs, have proved themselves abundantly able to be independent and self-supporting. That they are true Christians in belief and practice, the subjoined testimony of one of their number will show.

Vladimir Tchertkoff, in his pamphlet published in London in 1897, called "Christian Martyrdom in Russia," gives the following account of their tenets: "They always called themselves Christians. They acknowledged one sacred, universal and apostolic church, which the Lord by his coming has assembled, consecrated and replenished by the gifts of the Holy Ghost; and which is of course the union of all faithful and true Christians." They acknowledge God as being in three personifications of the one and unutterable. That the first person of the Trinity is the Light, the Lord our Father. The second person is the life—the Son of our Lord; and the third person is peace—the Holy Spirit our God." "For the salvation of man, indubitable faith in Christ is necessary; but faith without works is dead, as also are works without faith."

"The conception they have of Christ is based on the teaching of the Gospel. They acknowledge his coming in the flesh, his works, teaching and suffering; but chiefly they accept all this in a spiritual sense, and affirm that all contained in the Gospel should be accomplished in ourselves. Thus Christ must be begotten in us, born, grow up, teach, suffer, die, revive and ascend; and it is thus that they understand the new birth or renovation of man. They say that Jesus himself was and is the gospel, eternal and living, and has sent it forth, preached in the word. He himself is the Word. That except through God and his Christ there is no salvation. They say they are baptized into the Word through the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, as Christ taught his apostles. This baptism takes place when a man repents with a pure and willing heart, and calls upon God. External baptism they regard as useless, saying that water only washes off the uncleanness of the external body. As to the communion, they partake at all times of the sacred, life giving sacraments, in the forgiveness of their sins, spiritually, through the inward acceptance of the Word of God, which is Christ. The communion of the body and blood of Christ, through the form of bread and wine, they do not accept."

The following history of these people has been taken from the Daily Sun, a newspaper published in Canada:

THE DUKHOBORS.

The Dukhobors, or Spirit Wrestlers, as they are nicknamed, members of the Universal Brotherhood seem to have originated as a separate sect, in a village on the Southern frontier of Russia, in the middle of the eighteenth century. Their doctrines infected other peasants in other parts of Russia, and ere long attracted the attention of the government, and of the dignitaries of the orthodox Greek Church. A number of the sectaries were banished to Siberia, some of them making small settlements on the borders of Manchuria, where, it may be mentioned, their descendants were visited by Prince Kropotkin while he was aide-de-camp to the Governor General of Eastern Siberia, about 1868. In the reign of Alexander I. a tract of land on the northern shore of the Sea of Azov was set apart as a kind of Dukhobor reserve, and an agricultural commonwealth was established by them, under the leadership of an ex-sergeant of the Russian army, called Kapustin. Kapustin is described as having "governed them with practical sense, amounting to genius." There the members of the Universal Brotherhood lived for more than fifty years, undisturbed. The idea of isolating the Dukhobors was evidently intended to put a stop to their proselytizing tendencies, but, on these manifesting themselves, notwithstanding their comparative seclusion, their leader Kapustin was arrested, and the community broken up. Since then their doctrines have been held by at most at any one time about twenty thousand peasants, in various villages in Southern Russia. Their religious beliefs have all along been similar to those of the Society of Friends.

From time to time the attention of the government and of the ecclesiastical authorities has been drawn to them. The government objected to them, on account of their refusal to render military service, while the ecclesiastical authorities disapproved of their principles and practices, as these are opposed to those of the Orthodox Greek Church. In consequence of this disapproval the people have been subject to repeated banishments, and their prosperous homes have again and again been broken up.

In 1840 and in 1850 they were banished to Trans-Caucasia, near the Turkish frontier. For some years they were allowed to live their life there without molestation, and though the inhospitable climate of the Caucasus produced a high rate of mortality, yet some of the villages were exceedingly prosperous, particularly those in the neighborhood of Kars, where they are said to have cultivated their land with such assiduity, as greatly to increase the product of the soil. Up to 1887, the Russian governments administered the conscription laws with comparative laxity, and in consequence, non-resisting peasant sects were allowed to remain in comparative immunity, and during the period many of them became the pioneers of Russian colonization.

From 1887 onward, however, the military necessities of Russia compelled the authorities to carry out the conscription laws with great stringency, and then began the series of recent persecutions, especially of the Dukhobors, which have led to the present situation. The attitude of the sect towards the government was for the most part a steadfast one, but there were some backsliders.

In 1895, the Great Party, or those who adhered rigidly to the traditional tenets of the sect, made up its mind to destroy its offensive weapons, and these were formally burned on the night of the 28th of June, in Tiflis, Elisavetpol and in Kars. This was taken as a sign of rebellion, and the persecution became more vigorous.

In 1897, V. Tchertkoff, the author of "Christian Martyrdom in Russia," who was formerly an officer in the Russian Army, visited St. Petersburg, and had an interview with Pohidenotseff, the high procurator of the Holy Synod, the result of which was an intimation to himself that it would be convenient for him if he withdrew from Russia. The visit of the Empress Maria, the mother of the present Czar, to the Caucasus was, however, taken advantage of by the Dukhobors and their sympathizers, and their case was put before her. It is understood that the dowager Empress enlisted the sympathies of the Czar, and secured for the Dukhobors permission to leave the country. This permission was given in the Second Month, 1898, and then the Dukhobors immediately began to make assiduous inquiries about suitable places to which they might emigrate. They had been accustomed to agriculture, principally corn-growing, and to a dry climate with cold winter. At first they thought of Cyprus, which is now being colonized under the care of an English Cyprus Colonization Committee. Proposals were also made about other pla On March 28th, a month after formal per sion had been given to the emigrants, Dukhobors telegraphed to V. Tchertkoff Purleigh in Essex, England, for help and vice.

The Society of Friends in England had li ally aided the Dukhobors during the three ceding years, and it was only natural that t should be again approached on the subj The matter was brought before the Mee for Sufferings, a committee was formed, later an appeal was issued. Simultaneo the small community at Purleigh, consistin sympathizers with the teachings of Tols formed a Committee consisting of V. Tch koff, P. Birinkoff, A. Gilvart, (professor Royal College of Science, London), H. P. A er, (late Secretary of the Brotherhood Chu Croydon), and two or three others. V. Tch koff had sent to the Caucasus an ex-captain the British Army, Arthur St. John, who been expelled from Russia, on account of th inquiries. It was therefore thought to be pedient for a deputation from the Dukhol to come to England, for the purpose of s plying the information necessary for the kind of action under the circumstance. Ivin and P. Makhartoff, therefore, visited E land with their families, and the committee-r were then made aware of the state of the c It appeared that about thirty-five hundre the people were comparatively well off, that they had a considerable common fund sides the emigration fund, which they had ceeded in raising specially. In addition these about three thousand were, though possessed of very ample resources, still destitute. They also had a common fund, a fund for purposes of emigration. Th were, however, about two thousand who w much worse off than the previous sections, thousand of them in very urgent need of sistance. In view of these circumstances arrangement was made with the Cyprus co ization committee to receive eleven hund of those in most urgent need. Cyprus chosen, not because it was the most suit place for colonization, but because it was nearest. The British Government demand however, a guarantee of fifteen pounds e before permission would be granted to l Within a few days the Society of Frie with the greatest magnanimity provided whole of this amount, about seventy-five th sand dollars. The eleven hundred were t landed in Cyprus. From reports since ceived, they have done fairly well there dur the past summer, (1898), although it w appear that the rent charged them by Cyprus colonization committee was rather h er than perhaps the circumstances warran There thus remained to be dealt with th thousand five hundred persons, whose was not very specially urgent, and betw two and three thousand, whose case, as regg some of them at any rate, was urgent ind

Various places had been suggested, and fers had been received from the Argentine from Brazil, as well as from Texas and C fornia, but the state of the chronic disturbe in which the South American Republics w known to be involved, and the prevalence war-feeling in the United States, were couraging elements to people, one of wh ling principles was objection to military vice. The Committee at Purleigh having ived full authority from the Dukhobors to for them, entered into communication with ties in Canada. The matter was placed be- the government, and the present immigra- is the result.

n order that the Dukhobors might be fully re of the conditions in Canada, the two ilies which had visited England came out fontreal, in the Ninth Month, 1898. They e accompanied by Prince Hilkoff, the ne- w of the Russian minister of railways, who id himself much in sympathy with their re- ous views, particularly with their attitude ards militarism, and by Aylmer Maude, who been a merchant in Moscow, and who had the Dukhobors at Purleigh. This deputa- went to Edmonton, Canada, and to other ricts in the Northwest, for the purpose of ecting the country. There were three cial reasons why the emigration should be ducted as speedily as possible. One was t the resources which the people had, were g dissipated, by fines and removals in con- uence of the action of the authorities. ondly, the people were anxious to take ad- tage of the permission to emigrate, so g as the government adhered to the per- sion. How long this would last no one ld tell. Thirdly, the annual conscription es place on the first of First Month, and se young men who have reached the statu- r age, are then drawn into the army.

hese considerations rendered it advisable t those of the Dukhobors to whom they ap- d, should be aided in leaving the country hout delay. The number to be dealt with ned out to be about two thousand. Steps e taken to prcvide the necessary supple- nt to their own funds. Count Leo Tolstoi three short stories to a Russian publisher, the proceeds, about five thousand dollars, e remitted to the Purleigh committee. The iety of Friends in England, the individual nbers of the committee at Purleigh, and Society of Friends at Philadelphia, supplied means for the emigration of this contin- t, which comprises the poorest of the Duk- or groups.

ollowing is a copy of the official notifica- sent to the Dukhobors, giving them per- sion to leave Russia :

The fasting Dukhobortsi, who were expel- in 1895 from the district of Akhalkalak, transported into other districts of the ernment of Tiflis, having submitted a peti- to Her Imperial Majesty, the Empress ria Feodorovna, asking either to be grouped settled into one place and to be exempt n the duties of military service, or to be lwed to emigrate, the following instructions e been received :

. The request for exemption from military vice is refused.

. The fasting Dukhobortsi, with the ex- ion, of course, of those who have reached age at which they can be summoned to the es of military service, and of those who e failed to fulfil these duties, may emigrate, ler these conditions:

a) That they provide themselves with a ign passport in accordance with the es- lished order; (b) That they leave the fron- of Russia at their own expense, and (c) that before leaving, they sign an agreement never to return within the borders of the empire, understanding that in case of non-compliance with this last point, the offender will be condemned to exile to remote places. As to their request to be settled in one village, it is refused. The notification is issued by order of the government of Tiflis to one of the petitioning Dukhobortsi, Vassili Potopoff, in answer to his personal application."

TIFLIS, February 21st, 1898.

The following account of their new colony in Canada is taken from a newspaper report in the Toronto Daily Globe, of Ninth Month 9th, 1899:

"The writer of this article has just finished a tour among the Dukhobors settled throughout the west, and it is safe to say that no class of settlers has ever come to this part of the world who could show as good a record for industry and thrift as the Dukhobors, who to-day form a colony of over seven thousand souls. The cry that the Government had introduced a pauper immigration, appeared at the first glance not without justification, for in truth these people have been deprived of almost the bare necessities of existence, and the unhappy result is apparent to the most casual onlooker; but the work done by these people during the last three months, accomplished in spite of great physical weakness and fever, loudly proclaims the fact that these are no paupers who claim the right to enroll themselves as Canadians. Wherever they have been, life has been sustained by the efforts of their own hands, and the liberty of spirit that made them the victims of persecution has rendered them serfs in name only, and has kept them from sharing the degradation of their class in Russia. The power that Christianity in the truest sense has of civilizing, in our acceptation of the word, is made manifest in this instance.

These people, deprived of even the few necessaries of life, common to the children of the soil, hunted from pillar to post, made to herd like beasts of the field, beaten, ill treated, mothers separated from their children, and wives from their husbands, are to-day the most polite, orderly people it is possible to imagine. The villages they are building testify to the powers or organization and inherent orderliness of the people; the results of self-discipline are apparent in the people as a unit, and the very core of their religious convictions is self-restraint. The absence of anything like noisiness or excitability strikes one the instant one moves about among the villages. The very children are curiously quiet and gentle in their mode of play, and they are miniatures of their elders in more than their picturesque costume. The quiet dignity noticeable comes from the best possible influence, the parents having apparently little trouble in training their children other than by example of their own quiet and industrious lives. There is something unutterably pathetic to those who live in this wrangling, noisy world of the nineteenth century, to see the women and the children of the Dukhobors quietly and silently bearing, with a great patience, the load that is laid upon their shoulders. The innate dignity of the women and their uncomplaining, untiring patience, have perhaps been the reason that they have had strength given them to endure to the end, trials that their magnificent physique could not alone have enabled them to withstand. They are a great people—that is undeniable; and while they are the children of the soil, they are the aristocracy of the soil, people who, to use Ruskin's words, have found that 'all true work is sacred, and in all good hand-labor their is something of divineness.' Their hand-labor is marvellous, from the finest embroidery to the building and plastering of their houses. The situation that the majority found themselves placed in, was one which called for decisive action, and the Dukhobor women, as all great-hearted women must, rose to the occasion, and it is to them, as it were to the great pioneer women of our country, that we are to look for the best results in the settlements of our Dominion. The men of each community were called upon to hire themselves out as farm laborers and railway navvies. The distances in the west are enormous, and it meant simply the exodus of the men from the villages, and absence that was to be counted by weeks or months. Then too, in a village of perhaps a hundred and twenty souls, they might have a yoke of oxen or one pair of horses, and these were to plough and carry lumber for the frames of houses, and more than all, transport flour from a great distance to feed the community. The question was a grave one; winter comes quickly in these latitudes. But the question was answered by the women, who turned to, and helped the few men left in the village to build the houses, and not only trod the mortar and used their hands as trowels, but carted the logs, drawing them for miles with the aid of two simple little wooden wheels which were no bigger than those of a child's go-cart. The earth for the mortar was carried on their backs in baskets woven of willow, or in huge platters hewn out of the logs: the water being carried at times for half a mile in two buckets, hewn like the platters, out of trunks of trees and hung at the end of a long sapling. A deep trench was dug and by the edge sat a score of women less strong than their Spartan sisters, chopping with a rude hatchet hay or grass, to mix with the water in the trench or pit. Bucket after bucket of water was poured in from the primitive wooden pails, while six women with skirts kilted up nearly to the waists, trod the mortar until it was as smooth as paste. Another gang of women carried it in wooden troughs to the houses, where six or eight others plastered the logs, both inside and out, with the cold clay paste. The neatness of the work was astonishing, for while in some cases logs large enough to build a log house were to be found, in others the walls had to be woven out of coarse willow branches, the upright posts alone being of sufficient strength to support the roof of sods, (two layers) laid on with a neatness and precision that is seldom seen in this country, and the walls of the houses themselves were not only stuffed with clay, but presented, both inside and out, as smooth a surface as if a trowel of a first rate plasterer had been at work. In many places these people had neither tools nor nails, and the carpentering-work of the interior of the houses is a marvel of ingenuity."

GENIUS IN DISTRESS.—Homer was a beggar; Terence was a slave; Paul Borghese had fourteen trades, yet starved with them all; Tasso was often distressed for five shillings; Bentivoglio was refused admittance into a hospital he had himself erected; Bacon lived a life of distress; Sir Walter Raleigh died on the scaffold; Spenser died in want; Milton sold his copyright of "Paradise Lost" for fifteen pounds, at three payments, and finished his life in obscurity; Dryden lived in poverty and distress; Steele lived a life of perfect warfare with bailiffs; Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield" was sold for a trifle to save him from the grip of the law; Fielding lies in the burying ground of the English factory at Lisbon, without a stone to mark the spot; Savage died in prison at Bristol, where he was confined for the debt of eight pounds; Butler lived a life of penury and died poor; Chatterton, the child of genius and misfortune, destroyed himself.—Church Weekly.

Comforter—Advocate.

"He shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever." John xiv. 16. The word "comforter" does not convey to our minds the meaning of the original word which it is intended to translate. The Greek is paraclete, some one called to one's side to assist him, or plead his cause, especially in a court of justice, hence "advocate." There is no office better known in Oriental lands, or to which there is more constant resort, than that of paraclete. No one would ever think of asking for a wife for himself. He must always have a go-between to plead his cause and recount his excellence. I was paraclete hundreds of times for my poor oppressed Syrians. When they wished their cause to be laid plausibly before those over them in authority, they used to approach me through some intermediary who, they believed, had influences with me. Many a time I was urged to assist the people in shady transactions, but often they came to me when cruelly wronged, and I was glad to aid them. There was always much difficulty in getting from the people a clear and straightforward statement; and it was no easy matter to construct a simple narrative out of the tortuous and passionate pleadings of the poor illiterate folk, and my business was to get hold of the facts, and place them dispassionately before the authorities, supported by any evidence I could obtain, and by all the authority I could bring to bear on the question. Jesus had been Paraclete to his followers, and would still remain their mediator between them and the Father; but as He was going away, He would send another Paraclete, who would take his place with them, aid them in adjusting their minds to spiritual truth, and so bring their cause to Him, and through Him in a manner acceptable to God.

Christ thus takes the common function of advocate known to every Oriental, and by means of it teaches them the work of the Holy Spirit, who should remain with them, an abiding light, making the way clear through all the tangled maze of earthly existence.—The Armory.

"What an unspeakable blessing it is to the poor, dependent children of the Church of Christ to feel his presence among them—to feel his spirit as precious ointment poured forth; this far exceeds any preaching of the Word—for then the great Minister of ministers is giving them the bread and wine of his own kingdom which is not of this world, and has none of the wisdom of this world in it."—Sarah Emlen.

Ohio Yearly Meeting.

A correspondent in attendance at the late Annual Gathering, held at Barnesville, writes "We feel to have had a week of many favors, indeed, much to enjoy. The meeting was smaller than usual, many vacant places of our dear aged friends called loudly to us, perhaps more so than their voices could have done.

"When we first came together Seventh-day morning, I think there was a general sense of loneliness, not a single minister from other Yearly Meetings; our old Friends said the first time they ever remembered such to be the case. [A minister from North Carolina arrived at a later meeting.]

"It was most impressive and instructive, how the Head of the Church did seem to be with us in a special manner, tendering our hearts together, causing us to feel such individual responsibility that we must not depend on others but must go direct to the Fountain Head for ourselves.

"This feeling seemed to be with us to an unusual degree, during the various sittings, so that I think I may say many of us who are younger, especially felt we had never sat a more strengthening and helpful Yearly Meeting.

"Perhaps it was in accordance with His wise plan that we should be left without outside help this once, that we might feel our own strength."

For a more detailed account of Ohio Yearly Meeting, a member has sent us the following report from The Barnesville Republican, as in his judgment "quite good and nearly correct."

The followers of Fox again assembled at the established place of their annual gathering. While they are perhaps fewer in numbers than sometimes, they seem imbued with a fervent desire to maintain unstained the precious principles left them as an inheritance by their fore fathers, who suffered, many of them, even unto death, rather than give them up. While the fathers and mothers in Israel have many of them been called from works to rewards, the large attendance of young members who take active interest indicates that there will be a succession of standard-bearers.

Seventh-day.—The business of the day was chiefly the reading of epistles from the Yearly Meetings with which we correspond, excepting the one from Kansas, which has not been received. All contained much brotherly counsel. The Canadian brethren deplored the war in which our country was engaged, but expressed a thankfulness that theirs was at peace, and declared that Britain should not stain her hands with the blood of Africa. New England spoke of the bountiful harvest, yet the laborers were few, and prayed that the Lord of the harvest would send more laborers into his vineyard. Western Yearly Meeting admonished all that they must be baptized by the Spirit before they can become the chosen vessels of God. Iowa expressed a belief that the fraternal greetings of the different meetings are productive of good, encouraging and strengthening each other in best things. Committees were appointed to essay replies to the epistles, after which the meeting adjourned to eleven o'clock Second-day morning.

First-day morning.—The well-known voice of Benjamin Brown, of North Carolina, first broke the stillness, beginning with the text, "Out of Egypt have I called my son," showing how God was calling all to come out of Egyptian darkness of sin into his marvellous light. Enlarging, he dwelt with power upon the fundamental principles of Quakerism. William Test, of Iowa, in the vein of prayer, entreated all to a greater willingness to submit themselves a living sacrifice, wholly acceptable to God. Hannah Stratton repeated the text, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works," yet showing that the mere literary knowledge of the Scriptures cannot contain the saving power of grace. Jacob Maule spoke of the wonderful miracles recorded in the Scriptures as that they were given for our good. Referring to one who had endeavored to despise them and unsettle the minds of others, how he had died as he had lived, without hope and without God, and expressing the belief that we should not judge him, but rather pity those of his household who mourn without hope.

First-day afternoon.—Supplication was made that the high and holy One might look down from his throne of grace and remember our weaknesses and infirmities, and strength was besought to rise with patience the race that is set before us. Joshua Smith began with the language, "Oh, that I might die the death of the righteous and that my latter end may be like his," adding, "Such, I trust, is the desire of every thoughtful person now present; but we must live the life of the righteous and must learn to know Him whom to know is eternal life. No man can save his brother nor give Him a ransom for his soul, but all must look to Him who holds the keys to eternity. The days once were when the law was handed down from the lips of priests and recorded on tablets of stone, but now they are written on the heart. Elwood Conrad's voice was next heard, expressing a fear that there were some present who were living in the world without God, and what would be their condition if the summons should come, "This night thy soul shall be required of thee." The sacrifice of Christ without the gates of Jerusalem was an atonement for sin, that all who believed on Him might be saved. But the prince of our soul's destruction is well content if we profess a form of religion but bring not forth works meet for repentance. Esther Fowler in gentle tones entreated all to solemnly that when the solemn summons comes they may be prepared to enter into the joy of the Lord. Benjamin Brown supplicated that the seed sown this day might fall on good ground and spring up into everlasting life.

The representatives reported the name of Nathan R. Smith for clerk, and James Walton for assistant, for men's meeting, and Sara N. Hobson clerk, and Miriam Dewees assistant, which was satisfactory to the meeting, and they accordingly occupy their stations. The epistle from Kansas now being present was read to the satisfaction of Friends.

The meeting then entered into the state of society by the reading of the queries and answers from each of the Quarterly Meetings, which demonstrated that while Friends are steadfast in maintaining their fundamental principles, yet there were some shortcomings in minor points, which was the cause of much concern among consistent Friends. Elwood Conrad, with convincing strength, defended the plainness of dress and address, stating that "if we will weigh the objections advanced by some in the balance of righteousness, I can express it in no other words but an unwillingness to come under the cross of Christ, and if we hope to reign with him we must suffer with Him."

The report of the primary school committee showed that there were 526 children of school age in Ohio Yearly Meeting, the majority of whom have attended Friends' schools. The committee was encouraged to diligence in its duty and an appropriation of two hundred and fifty dollars was made for its use.

Benjamin Brown spoke earnestly of need of Friends, how that their light should shine that they not be ashamed to show before the world their faith in the principles they profess, how in the bloody rebellion of Ireland only one Friend lost his life, and he put on a military uniform, but the Lord will keep, as it were, in the hollow of his hand, all who put their trust in Him, adding that he had travelled much in this land and had also been treated with respect, though his garb was simple and plain; that the world needs our principles as much as it has ever done.

Third-day.—The proceedings of the day were largely reports from various committees.

In reading the notices of deceased ministers and elders the committee for distribution of appropriate writings of Friends reported progress in their work and asked for $100 for its use the coming year. Benjamin Brown asked all young members to read those writings, so as to be well informed as to the reasons for the origin of our Society.

The report of the Boarding School showed that a prosperous condition, having a comfortable ce in favor of the past school year.

e minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings showed hat body had sent the following cablegram to rican delegates at the peace conference at The e:
We desire your encouragement, and crave for ie assistance in your efforts for arbitration."
which the following reply was received:
incere thanks for your sympathy and encour- ent."
ch encouragement was given towards the daily ng of the Scriptures. William Test said that rents should collect their families and read criptures, not as a form, but as a duty to their ies and their God.
o ministers were liberated to pay a visit to Women's Meeting. The visit was felt to be a of favor.
urth-day.—The public meeting to-day was ably one of the most favored of the session, t truly seemed as though the Divine presence l be felt by many. Peter Dyer asked all to yield e invitation: "Come ye to the waters, and he hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, buy wine and milk without money and with- rice." David Holloway quoted, "God, who ndry times and in divers manners spake in past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom ath appointed heir of all things, by whom also ade the worlds." "For God so loved the d that He gave his only begotten Son, that oever believeth on Him might live;" and said belief is what we stand most in need of, and we must become in a childlike condition be- we can be taught by the great Teacher. Ben- n Brown said that Friends should speak in ence to the Divine will, and that "we some- s feel that for Zion's sake we cannot hold our e, and for Jerusalem's sake we cannot rest un- y righteousness hath gone forth to enlighten vorld." After defending earnestly the position riends in regard to baptism and resurrection, id that all should make their calling and elec- sure so that it might be with us as it was with o whom he referred, who, when on his death- had no concern for himself, for his work had done, and well done, in the daytime, adding, we never meet again in this world, may we all erited to meet in that better world, for if we illing to wear the cross we will surely wear rown." Elwood Conrad petitioned that all t learn to walk in the high and holy way of ross, "for as high as the heavens are above earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, the Lord." Hannah Stratton spoke to the g, believing that there were some present who e willing to make sacrifice to their God, realiz- hat we have here no continuing city. If it was ssary for King David, the royal psalmist, to "Cleanse me from secret faults," is it not h more necessary for us earnestly to prepare blessed eternity, when this corruptible should on incorruption and this mortal immortality? b Maule reminded all of the prayer of Christ n He prayed that we might all be one, desiring we might all be of one mind and walk close to , so that we may be filled with the knowledge s will. A petition followed to the great Head of Church to remember this once highly favored ple and bring them back to their ancient faith- ss. Sarah Ann Hobson desired that we might verlook the still small voice which reproves r every sin.
fth-day.—The day was devoted largely to con- ring reports of committees. The one having of some Indians in Iowa reported improve- t among them, and requested to be released, ch was granted. The committee to settle with surer showed a balance of $180.08 in his hands, asked for an appropriation of $150.00 for the ing year. The trustee of Robert Miller's leg- showed $345 90, accrued interest, to be used educational purposes where needed. The epis- omittee produced replies to those received, ch were read and approved. James Henderson ed that we might all work our soul's salva- with fear and trembling. William Test, with t tenderness, spoke to all, encouraging all to ter faithfulness in the maintenance of their ciples. Benj. Brown expressed thankfulness eing thus favored to meet together and trans- n harmony the business of the Church, and prayed that we might be kept under a feeling of Divine Presence. The meeting adjourned to meet at the same time and place next year, if so permitted.

CHRISTIAN LOVE.

By E. C. Johnson.

"Love is fulfilling of the law,"
Wrote the Apostle Paul,
"And gospel, too," adds William Penn,
Thus wide encircling all,
When full it reigns within the heart
Is saved from sin's enthrall.

"By this shall men most surely know
Ye my disciples are,
If ye have love," said Christ our Lord,
Our Light, our risen Star.
For God is love, whose saving grace
Is shed on near and far.

And if our gathering to-day
Is in true Christian love
Our souls are linked with that high throng
Who swell the strains above.
If from each soul the prayer shall rise
For Christian love's increase,
'Twill help waft toward that blessed goal,
Where war and strife shall cease.

Spiritual Life is that which distinguishes man from the lower animals, and that which man has in likeness with God. All the lower animals have physical life, the life of the body. All the lower animals have intelligent life. Though we call this, on the one hand, reason, or, on the other hand, instinct; we cannot define the line between the two, so that a child or the wisest men can distinguish it. Man alone, while having physical and intellectual life has also spiritual life (not the religious sense merely, but spiritual life), that which enables him to conceive of spirit, to think of spirit, to commune with spirit, to reach out after union with spirit. This is the one sure line which separates the lowest and most primitive, or most degraded, of men from the best and most highly trained of the lower animals. In the possession of "spiritual life" man is formed in the image or likeness of God. In the recognition and cultivation of his spiritual life man employs and develops his God-like nature. A man may train and develop his physical nature so as to be the champion athlete of the city or country or universe, and yet be only on the plane of the bull or kine or elephant. A man may train and develop his intellectual nature, even on the religious side, and yet be nothing more than an intellectual animal, informed about the Bible as a book, and at the very front in all questions of higher or lower criticism, and ready to discuss the world's religions as the world's religions, yet without having exercised or brought into play his spiritual life or nature. The man who wants to cultivate his spiritual life, to be dominated by it, to manifest it to others, to be in closer fellowship with God, and to be more like God, can do so, will do so, and others will be aware of that fact. There are men who have cared for and developed their bodies so that their physical power manifests itself, who have trained and exercised their minds until their intellects are superior, yet whose spiritual life is prominent above all because it is most valued and most exercised. We ought to be that sort of persons, and yet more so. That should be our direction of aspiration and of striving.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

A Day in Holland.

This little narrative will tell of one day's observation in Holland. Our party consisted of seven young or youngish men from the staid old city of Brotherly Love. We had two days before wandered around Rotterdam and looked at the house where Erasmus was born. We had seen men push milk or bread carts, with dogs harnessed underneath the carts, the animals pulling away in honest business fashion to help the men. In Rotterdam dogs are not just kept to be looked at, but are compelled to work for their living like the rest of us.

Then too, we had been at The Hague, that beautiful residence city, the capitol of Holland. The brick work in the big public buildings looks just as good as new, although about six hundred years old. The little Queen's Palace is not such a grand building after all. We had seen the Art Gallery with some of the marvellous productions of Paul Potter and Reubens. We had driven down miles of beautiful streets, with the lazy canals in the centre, and with delightfully broad, comfortable old residences on either side. The views in these streets are softened by rows of stately trees, the deep shadows of which are reflected in the somber waters they guard. We had been out into the woods or park of The Hague, where all kinds of vehicles are propelled over the straight, level roads for miles under the fine old trees, and where the forest or flower-bordered highways disappear into a point as you look up or down the charming vistas.

What much interested us in Holland is that nearly everything is "spick and span" clean. The people everywhere are washing. I have seen men rubbing down the outside wall of a three-story house with soap and water; and a woman mopping up the gutter in front of her home with a big towel!

The particular morning I tell about found us in Amsterdam. This old city lies a few miles from the Zuyder Zee, on a broad river which admits large ocean steamships to the quays. The city has about 375,000 people. Its principal streets are laid out almost parallel to each other, with wide canals in the middle, many of which are thronged with all sorts of craft of unfamiliar designs. Many of these vessels seem to be the homes of the families of those who manage them, and on their decks the little folks romp, and play and swing just as if on land. Busy little tugs shoot here and there on their various errands. Numerous iron or stone bridges cross the canals at intersecting streets. Many of them are drawbridges of novel construction. The water in the canals looks black and greasy. There is little current, and occasionally a disagreeable smell suggests the impression that maybe it is not altogether healthy. However, the people look pretty hearty, so I presume the sanitary arrangements of the city are good.

The houses and shops of Amsterdam are mostly from three to five stories in height, each front presenting at the top a gable more or less elaborate, the whole effect frequently being quite stately and handsome. Here, as in other cities of the Netherlands, we noticed that many of the front walls lean out towards the streets, as if they had been forced from the perpendicular by the foundations yielding in the soft soil. The windows are generally very broad, with plate glass ; and have Venetian blinds outside the sash and not within as we used to see in America years ago.

After breakfast we sallied forth through busy streets, which are lined with names of firms and localities, which seem as it were jawbreaking in their lack of vowels and their excessive length. The Dutch language is portentous to a foreigner. After sundry inquiries of policemen, and more or less wild gesticulations, we reached the steamboat landing in good time. Our destination was the Island of Marken.

Soon after leaving the pier we went through a lock which let us down into a canal at the level of the ocean, and along this water we wended our way through a typical Holland country. Great dykes kept the canal in place, and for miles on one side of us the land lay from five to twelve feet below the surface of the water. On both sides extended broad acres of green pasture land, dotted with thousands of Holstein cattle or gentle sheep. The fields were separated by little ditches. Indeed, Holland looks like this everywhere we have been ; a dead level of rich green with straight ditches and nothing above except the lovely rows of trees growing on the dikes. But I must not forget the red tile roofs of the quaint old farm houses which peep out of the masses of foliage that surround them. Nor must we forget the windmills which dot the landscape in every direction. Here and there the traveller will notice an extra massing of the trees out on the horizon, from the midst of which will rise a graceful spire ; and he knows that this marks a village, and that if he once gets under those trees he will find some of the most picturesque streets, and funniest little old houses and most interesting people he ever came into contact with.

At the first village we stopped long enough to see some of the sights: the street was probably twenty-five feet wide and was densely shaded, having a canal on one side and strange cottages on the other, surrounded by cute little flower gardens. The choice scenes up and down the cross-ditches, the cottages, the trees, the lights and shadows all made ideal views for the kodak friends of the party. We went into a cheese factory. First we passed through the proprietor's hallway back into the factory, which in the winter is used as a stable. The stalls were at this time of year nicely painted and the floors sanded or covered with oil-cloth in the most artistic fashion, and everything wonderously clean. The pine-apple cheeses are made in moulds and the print secured by putting them into a net before being pressed in the mould, then the form of the net is thus pressed into the soft cheese, so securing the appearance of a pine-apple to the finished product.

In this village we noticed what we had seen elsewhere in Holland. The women wear a head-dress, made of what might be described as a sort of brass shield or cap, which extends on both sides of the head over the ears. In front over the temples are little things that look like small brightly polished brass flags, which give a most novel appearance to the face. The whole arrangement is surmounted by a white muslin cap, the cut of which seems to vary according to the taste or fancy of the wearer. The remainder of the women's dresses is frequently almost as unique.

Very funny sights were presented as our steamboat pushed along. One I recall—that of a big fat man in a good sized row-boat, lying back in the stern thereof, surrounded by fishing tackle and a variety of other things connected with creature comfort. He was evidently out for a holiday. He was being pulled along at a lively rate by a slender, poor little old man, who had the other end of the tow-rope wound around his neck, and who trudged along with a smiling countenance as if he thought he had rather a good sort of job after all!

As we went towards Marken we noticed the steps leading down to the canal opposite the farm-house. At these places there would very likely be a round-faced, brown-armed, stout Dutch girl, washing up kettles and pans in the quiet water, with a vigor and energy that betokened a sturdy race. She would coolly watch us as we passed, never ceasing the active scrubbing which was making her brass utensils glisten in the summer sun.

Towards noon we reached Monnikendam. Here we took about a mile's walk through the village. It looked like any other Dutch town, but was particularly memorable to us because of the crowd of boys our party got about them. This was accomplished by tossing Dutch cents into the crowd of youngsters, and it was great fun to watch them scramble for the prizes. The charm to the Americans was founded on two things : first, to hear the wild clatter of the wooden shoes as the boys rushed over the pavements after the money ; and secondly, to see the said wooden shoes and their active owners mixed up in inextricable confusion as they struggled for the coppers. As we steamed away from Monnikendam the happy children raised a farewell song in an unknown tongue, and their childish voices made a most pleasant adieu.

Our next point was Marken, it being a small island out in the Zuyder-Zee. You enter the little port through a mass of jet black rigging, for the inhabitants are great fishermen. Marken is one of the most noteworthy places in Europe ; here the people have probably retained the ancient ways and dress to a larger extent than any other place near or in civilization. The visitor is suddenly introduced into the sights and conditions of centuries ago.

At the wharf were crowds of children in the strangest costumes imaginable. Their headdress was a sort of turban. The bodies were like those one sees in pictures of many centuries past. The frocks bulged out in the most ridiculous fashion. The boys wore just as remarkable attire. Up to six years of age the boys and girls dress alike, all wear funny little caps and bodices, and immense bloomers. The difference in the whole outfit is that the boys have a little colored spot in the top of their caps, whilst the girls have none. The effect of the whole thing is enhanced by the brilliant coloring of the children's clothing.

Nor are their elders any less picturesque in their attire. The men wear gay shirts, and bloomers as large as can be conceived of. The women's headgear is very elaborate, whilst their gay dresses and big aprons, and short frocks, and wooden shoes make them a sight to behold. Their houses are strange places. You go into a front room where the walls are hung thick with decorated plates—real Delft-ware, not to be purchased for any sum; and one would think one's self in a china shop. T furniture is very, very old. But the beds the strangest things of all. They are b back in the wall, just like good sized clos about four feet above the floor, and open i the room through a double door about four four feet in size. Back in this sort of clos amidst feather beds and sheets, these stra people sleep. Sometimes under the big bed closet, is a little one for the children. make up for these most unhygienic sleep places, it may be said that the houses scrupulously clean, the walls being quite pre and the floors nicely sanded.

Whilst we were among the people of Mark we noticed that they are very industric Down on the wharfs and canal banks, women were helping the men at the hard work. All were engaged in loading hay. other places I observed the women or yo girls pulling boats along, or rowing, and ha ling their craft with great dexterity.

Our party of seven had five kodaks. Th were used liberally, but the effects were v ous on some of the victims. The momen group of the natives would discover a ko coming down the street, the people wo scatter and run, except that in one village women were evidently quite flattered beca of such attention, and kindly stood whils "snap shot" was taken. I caught one or t babies in arms in this way, with their in scribable dresses. The proud mothers w like mothers everywhere—glad to have th little ones noticed. But the men especi objected to have their pictures carried a by such intruders as ourselves. As they worl they would keep very alert, and call to th friends when seeing the latter in danger being photographed. Sometimes they vig ously expostulated—one ran at me and put hat in front of the camera; another rushed one of our party with a pitchfork; under s circumstances they seemed quite excited would call out "Nay, nay." I confess t respect for their feelings when I saw th worried about my camera; but others were so troubled. Still we all secured some r pictures, for a kodak does its work very quic

The little voyage from Marken to Amsterd was accomplished in due time, and as we t evening sat down to dinner, we declared selves pleased with our rare and delightful perience. On our way up to the hotel stopped to do some shopping. This is a m bewildering matter in Holland. In calculat cost and comparing with American money, has to do a great deal of thinking at first. takes one hundred cents to make a guilde a guilden being equal to about forty cent United States money, and the beginner is palled when for instance he is charged tw cents for a car-ride. But he soon learns a Dutch cent is worth only four-tenths of cents, and that charges are not so high a all.

The fitness of some things does not seet get into a Hollander's head, from our poin view. Thus, when I retired at the close of day which is above described, I found in room and on my couch a great mass of clothing which it was a weariness to con plate. So out into the hall I carried feather covers each about three inches t and sundry other things wherewith to elf warm; until the pile was nearly as big ny bed, and half as high as myself. Why se people think it necessary to supply such ntains of covering in mid-summer, is inprehensible to the American mind!

ut in turn our party of seven seems to rise these Hollanders, in one way at least. r or wines are considered part of the dinner unch, and sometimes served gratis. We refuse the mild intoxicants and ask for er. I am glad we can thus so testify to cause of temperance. But why a party of ig men all neglect beer or wine, and acly are willing to pay for water, seems quite mprehensible to the average foreign waiter.

The Muncy Friends' Meeting.

hree miles north of Muncy, in the village ennsdale, stands the stone meeting-house he Religious Society of Friends. This mer it completes its one hundredth year. n scarcely fail to be interesting to anyone is interested in anything beyond his own onal wants. The geologist must notice at the fine limestone and splendid fossil rocks s century old walls. The ornithologist and nist may refresh their souls together in the e that slopes from the house to the road. lovers of beautiful scenery have the meetiouse itself, the Bald Eagle mountains to west and the long narrow valley, between -lapping foothills, leading north to the ntains in the blue distance. The historian s better than any of these, and the poet of all, for the latter adds imagination and ng to his facts.

st back of the meeting house, and surded by a low stone wall, is the burying nd. Here, within hearing of the voices of congregation, lie the ashes of the pioneers e memory is sacred to their descendants. e treaty of Fort Stanwix, 1768, opened way for the peaceful settlement of the try along the West Branch of the Susquea, and settlers flocked into it from various ere may have been Friends here before him, t was not until 1786 that he married and ght his wife to a temporary home near Wolf House, which he built later. In 1786 amin Warner, great-grandfather of Thomas Warner, of Muncy township, settled with mily on a farm between Hughesville and sdale.

nes Kitely, another great-grandfather of as A. Warner; Jesse Haines, grandfather e late Jesse Haines, and James Ecroyd, lfather of the present James Ecroyd, came after, but the exact date of their arrival I not been able to learn.

ere were also many other Friends who lipped in the log meeting house which on the site of the present one, but as their ndants have moved away or left the society, memory is not so especially cherished in eighborhood as of those mentioned.

nuel Wallace, who lived near where Hall's on now is, was by far the wealthiest of these Friends, and, wishing to have the meeting near his home, built a stone meeting house, at his own cost, not far from that place. This, however, was not convenient for the Friends at Pennsdale and eastward, for the roads were poor, carriages almost an unknown luxury and saddle horses insufficient to carry all who wished to attend. Besides, much of the primeval forest was still standing, and wild animals and Indians had by no means vanished. So the Muncy Friends (as those living at Pennsdale were then and are still called) petitioned the Quarterly Meeting, in Philadelphia, for a meeting house of their own, and the present structure was built in answer to their request, on land obtained from John Carpenter.

Until 1799 Muncy Friends had belonged, officially, to Exeter Meeting, in Berks County, and afterwards to Catawissa Meeting, in Columbia County, but in that year they were granted a Monthly Meeting of their own, and reported directly to the Quarterly Meeting, in Philadelphia, as they continue to do.

William Ellis, grandfather of the late Jesse Haines, was the first clerk of this Meeting and the earliest minutes are in his handwriting. These records have been deposited for safe keeping in the fireproof record room of the Friends' Library, in Philadelphia.

The Meeting was liberally supplied with ministers in those days, when three very able ones occupied the highest seats. These were Jesse Haines, Mercy Ellis, wife of William Ellis, and Elizabeth Kitely, wife of James Kitely.

Friends' houses were smaller then than now, but their hospitality was larger. A guest at the home of William Ellis records that the evening before Monthly Meeting about twenty Friends from a distance alighted at William Ellis' door, and were comfortably entertained for the night. This was no uncommon occurrence.

The early Friends also set a high value on education, and a Friends' school was established very soon and is still kept up. Apparently more was expected of children then than now, for once, when William Ellis was away from home, he wrote to his wife that he had been thinking that their four-year-old daughter Molly ought to know pretty well how to spell by that time. Those children who went to Westtown Boarding school, in Chester County—where most Philadelphia Friends have been educated for the last hundred years—travelled as far as Philadelphia on horseback. Friends, both men and women, who attended Quarterly and Yearly Meetings in Philadelphia, travelled there and back in the same way.

A few traditions and memories of those far-off times are contained in books which are private property, but one would give a great deal for a complete picture of life in the Friendly community in those old days.

If walls had tongues, as well as ears, what interesting tales those old stones could tell.—Elizabeth Willits Warner in Muncy Luminary.

Items Concerning the Society.

In addition to the Monthly Meetings mentioned last week, Henry T. Outland continued his religious service in New Jersey, in meetings held last First-day at Vincenttown in the afternoon, and in Mount Holly in the evening. These seemed to be occasions of Divine visitation.

A meeting to consider means of relief for the Dukhobors in Manitoba, was held in Arch Street Meeting-house on Fifth-day evening the 5th inst. An address by Charles Rhoads was read, recounting their past and present condition, as may be found on another page of this number. Joseph Elkinton gave a brief but impressive presentation of the state of that people as he witnessed them in their present places of abode. Their remarks, both in the stearage of the four ships which he visited as they reached the Canadian ports, and at religious opportunities in their present abodes, were satisfactory as to their faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. "A tormented people and driven from one place to another, had been in a poor position to attend schools." Twenty dollars was the fine imposed in Russia "for three persons to be found together reading the Scriptures." The instance of Moses Brown was adduced, rendering his thank offering to his Heavenly Father for the saving of his daughter, by proceeding to free his slaves; as a suggestion to us to inquire and apply the answer to our duty concerning this people in their distress, "what shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits to me?"

William Evans continued the narrative of their recent visit in Manitoba, and read interesting letters from that quarter.

Several speakers made suggestions as to the proper food to be furnished, and considerable expression was given in favor of our extending the opportunity among those of other religious persuasions to join in contributing means of relief. One Friend regarded this movement of the Dukhobors, as placing upon American soil "a great moral question, inviting the interests of the civilized world." Another called it "an object lesson to this world, involving a Divine purpose for good to our continent."

The meeting united in a proposition to recommend to the committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, now under appointment concerning the Dukhobors, to select out of each Monthly Meeting of this Yearly Meeting suitable men and women to solicit throughout our membership means to help the 7,500 Dukhobors now in danger of destitution of food through the winter, unless it is supplied by those who are less in want.

Notes from Others.

The New York Times is responsible for the following anecdote: A small group of farmers were gathered at the village store listening to the storekeeper reading an account of the death of Robert G. Ingersoll. When the reading was finished there was a momentary hush, when one of the hearers, who looked as though he might have been the original of "The Man with the Hoe," said in a low, musing tone, "For they are dead who sought the young child's life."

Are young men and women not willing to begin housekeeping on the plane upon which their fathers and mothers began? Will the next war we fight in this country be to free ourselves from the slavery to things? It is true that what we need is emancipation from the false standards that make permanent homes impossible to the innumerable thousands who are thereby deprived of the sweetest experience of love and life because of the lack of a home.—Ex.

The Atlantic Monthly, this month, has an interesting and very ably written article, by H. D. Sedgwick, Jr., on "The United States and Rome." Its thesis is the possibility, if not likelihood, that the Papal church will after a time "control the religious life of the majority of the American people," and while—as is likely to be the case in an article dealing with so great an array of facts—some of the statements seem to us unjustified, the general argument contains many things that are startlingly true.—Intelligencer.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Post Office Department has been informed by Mexico that a convention has been approved by the Mexican Senate whereby a mutual exchange of money orders will be carried on by the two countries.

Strange as it seems, the United States Government has not taken a complete accounting of the actual total weights of the mail matter carried by it for over twenty years.

Colonel W. P. Hall, of the Adjutant General's Department, who has been on duty for several months in Porto Rico, is in Washington on leave of absence. Colonel Hall witnessed the terrible tornado which was so destructive of life and property on the island, and speaks interestingly of that calamity and of the distribution of the relief supplies generously contributed by citizens of Philadelphia and other sections of the United States. "The work of administering relief to the people," said he, "has kept our entire military force in Porto Rico busy. The task is one of enormous magnitude, and would be hard in any country, but owing to the lack of roads on the island it is doubly difficult. Communication from one point to another is by means of bridle paths that are impassable in wet weather. Thus the means of extending aid are limited by conditions that the Americans cannot quickly remedy. Thousands of poor wretches were left in a starving condition and a few did actually starve to death before we could get them assistance. When I left rations were being given to about 200,000 people, which is at least one-fifth of the entire population of Porto Rico. The food that seems best adapted to their needs is cod fish, beans and potatoes, and very glad are the recipients of our bounty to get such nourishing provisions. The common people down there in ordinary times subsist largely on fruits and to an extent that cannot be wholesome, for they have a cadaverous complexion, and one might well describe them as having an habitual hungry look."

The War Department has received from General James H. Wilson a report on the provinces of Matanzas and Santa Clara, Cuba. General Wilson says: "So far as I can discover, the Cuban people in the provinces of this department are now as ready for self-government as they are likely to be at any time in the near future. It is my deliberate judgment that any other course will involve unnecessary delay, and will be accompanied by a further decrease of that feeling of friendship and gratitude which the Cuban people now entertain toward the United States, as well as by a lack of confidence in the business future, and by a continuance of the depression in the agricultural and commercial interests of the island, if not, indeed, by an actual increase of local disorder."

Marconi's system of wireless telegraphy was successfully used by that inventor last week, in reporting the position etc., of the competing yachts off Sandy Hook. Wireless telegraphy also gave a signal proof of its success when on the 5th inst. it was able to send from the ocean a denial of the cruel rumor that the steamer Grand Republic had sunk with all on board. It may be that the time is not far distant when every ocean steamer will have a wireless telegraph connection with the land, and thus be able to communicate at all hours its exact position.

The income from the war revenue taxes of the United States for the last fiscal year was $102,617,763. Over $37,000,000 was obtained from stamp taxes.

American cotton mills employ 33,000 women.

The total value of the lumber annually manufactured in the Northwest, including Michigan, Wiconsin and Minnesota, is $80,000,000.

A Chattanooga (Tenn.) plow company has received an order from a Calcutta, India, sugar planter for a complete outfit of sugar making machinery.

Among the work in hand by a Cincinnati manufacturing company are a compound Corliss engine for China and a complete saw mill outfit for New Zealand.

In Chicago a drainage canal contractor, who wanted some money to pay his workmen on Seventh-day night, found he had no paper on which to write a check. He wrote a check on a shingle, using a big marking pencil, and the check was cashed for $500.

Otto Grantz, the owner of the great gold mine near Deadwood, South Dakota, has shipped a car load of ore to Denver, which will give a return of about $85,000, the richest car load ever shipped from the Black Hills. Two armed guards accompanied the car to its destination.

The output of sardines on the Maine coast is likely to be increased from 900,000 cans in 1898 to 2,000,000 cans this year, in consequence of the introduction of a new canning machine.

In Union County, Ga., there is not a bar room, and 75 per cent. of the people own their own homes. Only one head of a family in the county seat does not own his home. There is not a dollar of bonds on the county, and with the tax rate three times larger this year than usual, the total State and county tax amounts to only $1.15 on $100.

The American whaler Beluga, Captain Bodfish, has arrived at San Francisco, fourteen days from Unalaska. Her total catch was sixty-three whales. Besides her cargo of oil she has on board 106,000 pounds of bone and nearly 200 valuable fur skins. The total catch of the other vessels of the whaling fleet since the last report was twenty-five whales. The collector of the port of Dutch Harbor sighted the bark Alice Knowles, with four whales, and the Gay Head, with two whales Eighth Month 15th.

Gold, silver, steel, aluminum and lead, when immersed in tauric acid, a new chemical discovery, become pliable and ductile as putty.

Last year 5,200,000 pounds of aluminum, valued at $1,716,600, were produced in the United States. The value per pound was therefore 33 cents. In 1888 19,000 pounds of that metal were produced, valued at nearly $3.33 a pound.

Professor Doremus says that the fire on the steamship Leona, of the Mallory Line, could have been instantly extinguished had the ship been equipped with wrought iron receptacles holding liquefied carbonic acid gas. These can be connected by pipes with the various small compartments in the holds of ships in which the cotton, jute or other combustible is stored, and the mere turning of a stop-cock will fill the compartment with the acid gas, and the fire is instantly extinguished. "Liquefied carbonic acid gas," he says, "is absolutely harmless, and will not injure cotton or jute, or even clothing, silks or satin. It is not unlike water, but its effect is immediate. There has never been a fire at sea but could have been prevented had this gas been used."

There were 428 deaths in this city last week, which is 64 more than the previous week and 21 more than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 228 were males and 200 females: 58 died of consumption; 33 of pneumonia; 32 of heart diseases; 24 of marasmus; 20 of apoplexy; 15 of cancer; 16 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 16 of uræmia; 12 of debility; 11 from casualties; 11 of cholera infantum; 10 of inflammation of the brain; 9 of typhoid fever, and 8 of nephritis.

FOREIGN.—On the 9th instant Lord Salisbury admonished the House of Lords that "matters of grave moment" await the coming session of Parliament, and Lord Devonshire in a speech said the situation is not more critical, and that no irrevocable step will be taken by Great Britain that may jeopardize a diplomatic adjustment of the issues.

The sum of two and a half millions of British gold is reported to have been seized by the Boers while in transit. This report is confirmed by a cablegram received by a mining company in London from their representative that the train upon which he was travelling from Johannesburg to Pretoria was held up and looted by Boers, who secured $1,500,000 in gold, the remaining considerably less than the original estimate. A special despatch from Pretoria says the Transvaal Government has seized gold to the value of $4,000,000, which is now lodged in the State Mint. The Government, the despatch adds, will indemnify the banks to which the gold is consigned.

The Venezuelan Arbitration Commission at Paris has announced its unanimous decision over the boundary dispute, fixing the lines, under which England secures most of the territory claimed by Venezuela. This conclusion causes much rejoicing in England, as the gold mines worked by British subjects is included in the award to British Guiana. It appears also to be satisfactory to the Venezuelans, as they gain a much desired point of land. The friends of arbitration rejoice that these desirable results are attained, and contend the difference had the subject been decided by the sword.

Christianity and War.

'e welcome to our columns the following act from the Baltimore American, omitting n it the few lines which speak of war in e cases as "a necessary evil." On Chris- grounds the writer could not say that we ld desert Christ for expediency by meeting with war. The Christian knows no higher ssity than the law of Christ:

Few subjects present more difficulties to Christian teacher than war. Christianity adically at variance with war. Christ's ings breathe a spirit of peace and broth- love in every line. There is not a text in f his speeches that can be construed into a fication of war. He goes even so far as der that one who has been smitten shall the other cheek to the smiter, or that he has been robbed of his cloak shall sur- er his coat also to the thief. When, there- clergymen are compelled to reconcile the ns of their governments in going to war the basic principle of Christianity, they find themselves in a dilemma, and in at- ting to explain, say foolish things. They c of the war as a holy war, to distinguish om other wars that are not holy, or they God is on the side of the country's arms use it is a just war. . . . . There never was a holy war, and it is safe y that there never has been an entirely war. Holy is a misnomer when applied to

It implies that it is a religious war, n is a paradox, if by that is meant that tianity is waging it. It is absurd to say ion is doing that which it expressly for-

The name of religion has at times been sed for that purpose, but names are often to conceal an underlying purpose. Nor correct to call a war just. Only compara- speaking may it be called so. Our re- war with Spain was as nearly just as such fflict can be; but in a dispute between two ns or two nations, which are merely an egation of persons, it is hazardous to say either side is absolutely just.

Christ taught an ideal civilization. Some men in all ages have accepted his teachings literally, and have unavailingly attempted to have their neighbors live up to them. Count Tolstoi is making the attempt at this moment. The most reasonable explanation seems to be that He formulated a plan which can only be fully realized when the human race has been developed to its complete mental and moral stature, and that He intended meanwhile that his followers should have it always before them as their ideal, which they must strive to reach. For instance, there were just as good men two thousand years ago as there are to-day, but there were not so many good men by many thousands. The increase was very gradual for centuries, but it has been rapid during the past hundred years.

"Every good man—every man who is mentally and morally developed to anything like his full stature—forms a nucleus or center about which gather others like himself. This will account, in some measure, for the large increase of superior men of the nineteenth century, and it gives promise of an increase during the next century of extraordinary proportions. When the influence of such men prevails, war will cease; or, in other words, the principles of the Christian religion will overcome the ambition, selfishness or fanaticism of nations. No Christian man considers that he is doing a service to Christianity by fighting over a dispute, and it is rank inconsistency to maintain that a nation is doing a service to religion by engaging in a war. . . . .

It is misleading to speak of wars as Christian or religious.

Shall an Applicant Join the Society, or its Principles?

Except for the principle of "the immediate and perceptible influence of the Spirit of Truth" the Society of Friends would not have come into being—at least it did not, except with that as its distinctive reason of existence. They owned and took for granted the other gospel and evangelical doctrines fundamental to the universal church, and continued much more in the life to hold them after being banded together in a special Society of Christ's church in order to emphasize that most vitalizing, but apparently overlooked principle. Accordingly while a true member of the Society of Friends could not spare one of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian church acknowledged from the beginning, that one which called it into existence and is our right to continuance among so many churches, is that without which a member, or one proposing to be a member, could not be a Quaker, or honestly hold membership, or be accorded our name. Neither could he, professing that alone, and denying the other gospel doctrines. These he must possess whether to be a Friend, or one of almost any other evangelical denomination. But to be added to the specific professors of the Divine Spirit and Word as immediately manifested to the individual, he must have added to his faith the knowledge of this truth, which while some individuals of other churches entertain their church creeds are shy of it. This principle being absent his title to our membership, present or prospective, is extinct or blank, but the other qualifications for membership suitable for other organizations may go on.

The confession "I love Jesus," added to an application for membership, was sufficient satisfaction to a committee to recommend that the applicant be received. It was a good confession, and sufficient for admission to several churches. But no other specific reason for membership in our profession appeared, and her membership did not continue long. Reports of hundreds this year dropping out from Western meetings are published, accommodated though those meetings are to that one ground of membership. Evangelists divide detachments off to the name of Friends on no further ground than what they can equally have the benefit of under other names in their own neighborhood. It is a mistake to divide churches to add to our number, unless the new section is to have something distinctive to stand for.

Present space forbids developing the suggestion here entered upon, and we leave it as a preface to further considerations.

Notes of a visit to the Dukhobor Villages in Canada.

BY JOB S. GIDLEY.

Leaving the Swan River we rode a short distance up the hill to Oswobozdenie village; and while our drivers were pitching our tent for the night, E. H. V., Alamanoffsky, with a few Dukhobors and myself, went a little further on up the hill, to see some grain and garden vegetables which were growing there, that the Dukhobors were anxious for us to inspect. We saw one field of barley and quite a large field of rye. Both were looking well, some of the grain in the latter standing nearly up to my shoulders.

Potatoes, beans, beet, carrots, onions and a few other vegetables were seen, and all looked in a thrifty condition, save a few of the tender plants which had been nipped by the frost. The small kind were all sown broad cast, and the carrots much too thick. It was explained to them through the interpreter that they would be likely to succeed far better another year if they would plant these in rows or drills, which suggestion was listened to attentively.

Here was the first experience in camping out to some of our party. We all enjoyed it however, and after having had a good night's rest, and partaken of our morning meal prepared on the open prairie, we were refreshed and strengthened for the labors of the day. Having had a religious meeting, which brought us all into unity of spirit, and tendered our hearts, we bade them farewell, and many were the kind words spoken to us; and although in another language, we felt we could understand the spirit in which they were uttered.

A young Dukhobor went to show us the way to the next camp, estimated to be two or three miles away. But one finds the estimates are pretty sure to be less, rather than more than the exact distance, as there are great many ins and outs that are not fully considered in judging of distances. This was found to be the case that morning, for in one place we found a plowed field across our trail which we had to go around, and there were many hills along the stream that had to be skirted, and it took some time to cover the estimated distance. Finally, we reached the top of a hill, a half mile or more from the river, and in sight of the long looked for Dukhobor settlement located near the stream. Our drivers said "Our horses can never go down this steep hill and get back again." It was then concluded that our interpreter and myself should proceed on foot to the village, while the rest waited with the teams upon the hill. We found that most of the people here landed in Halifax last winter, and we had an opportunity of renewing our acquaintance.

After spending a little time with them in a social way, and having a religious opportunity, we retraced our steps, feeling well paid for having made the effort to see them. Reaching the top of the hill we proceeded again on our way some six or seven miles farther down the river, being guided by another young man. We passed quite a number of Dukhobors, some mowing, some raking, and others heaping up the hay. (Prairie farmers call heaping, coiling.) Still others were picking strawberries and raspberries. Judging by observation one might say that the men do the mowing, the women the raking, and the young people the heaping up of the hay. We found, on approaching the river, that the next village was located upon the south side. We drove near to the stream on the north side, fed our horses, made a fire, prepared and ate our dinner, then crossed the stream and had a meeting, (alluded to in a communication of E. H. V.)

We then moved onward towards the next stopping place, where we spent the night. It was this place where E. H. V. writes, that they were all ready to receive us, their dooryards being swept and made presentable.

There was quite a large number of Dukhobors gathered in groups awaiting our arrival, and the language arose as we entered their midst, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth, peace, good will to men."

This company seemed glad indeed to see two Friends among them, and especially glad to see a woman Friend, and it did appear that the hand of the Lord was in it. After having had a favored religious opportunity with this people, and eating our supper in the open air, with feelings of thanksgiving for the favors of the day, we repaired to our tents under the hillside.

The next morning, Eighth Month 4th, the ground was white with frost, and I felt a great deal of sympathy for the Dukhobors who had worked so hard in trying to raise something this year; their potatoes were planted a little too late to mature during the short season of this latitude, so I fear that this crop will avail them little or nothing; yet I trust a way will be made whereby they may have a supply of them for the coming winter.

Before leaving this place I felt like giving the children a little instruction in English. I had but one primer with me, but when I opened the book and tried to teach them, they all appeared eager and interested to try to repeat what was told them, and I soon had a very interesting class of little boys and girls around me. I counted forty children in the group. E. H. V. had them repeat a few lines of poetry after her, which they did very nicely. What a field is here for those who have the welfare of these people at heart, who would be not only interested in teaching book knowledge, but correct principles of life as well! When schools are established among them, may their instructors all be true Christian men and women.

The next village seemed to be in rather a poor location. The soil was light and sandy; one could see no land near that he could ever hope to till with success. Still there may be better land not far away where one might plow with a better prospect of raising a crop.

Down under the hill is a large and excellent boiling spring, whose waters were welling forth pure and clear as crystal. The Dukhobors had a piece plowed and planted just below this spring, and had dammed up the little stream flowing from it, and had dug a trench eight or ten rods in length, leading the water from the stream into their garden. This locality for a camp may have been chosen partly on account of having good water near at hand. While we were looking over the land E. H. V. was dispensing medicine to the afflicted ones in the village.

After having had a religious meeting among them we started for the camp located southeast of Thunder Hill, the furthest point east reached upon Swan River, omitting two villages which we visited afterward on a journey back to Yorkton. Just before reaching this place we passed about half a mile south of the corners of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Assiniboia. We took our dinner at this camp, and heard of another settlement about three miles from the river on the south side. As there was no good trail for carriages to that place, Alamanoffsky and myself, with a guide, started off. We found some pretty steep hills to climb, but succeeded in reaching the settlement in about an hour.

The people told us that they were first located at the northeast of Thunder Hill, but not liking the place they had moved down where they then were; but added, that they were soon going to move again, about two miles further west. I thought it a great pity that after they had built their houses they should take them down again so soon.

One woman told us that her husband left them eight days before, to go to Yorkton with an ox team for provisions, and had not yet returned. One who can step into a corner gro at almost any hour of the day for his supp can hardly understand the condition of t who have to go on a journey of eight or days for the same.

Who art thou man, that boasteth thyself of to-morrow? year thou shalt be as dust, from which spirit has departed! The emphatic sente "Thou shalt die," is written against all hu ity—against peer and peasant, against D and Lazarus. At every swing of the pendu a soul goes into eternity. One has said "the smallest pore in the human body is a large enough to let death in." Pope Ad was choked by a gnat. A hair in a glas milk strangled a Roman Senator. The ski a raisin stopped the breath of the poet An reon. Life at best is evanescent; and question presses, are we writing our name sands to be washed out by the incoming or on the tablets of immortal souls in G book of remembrance? The True Gauge of Religion.

he voice of a Quakers' meeting is heard in ven, if those who gather there are clean eart and kindly in their dealings with their ws, whereas the song of the full-voiced r, the notes of the pealing organ, the mur- of prayer in the church of fashionable, less, covetous people, are absolutely un- d.

ie true gauge of religion is not in fast, or l, or outward observance, but in our bear- towards our debtors, neighbors and ser- s. We have as much love to God as we of Christ's love to man. If we love Him, hall love our brother also; but if we do ove our brother, whom we have seen, we ot love God, whom we have not seen. And ie flowers, incense, observances, and rites ighter than vanity to Him who treasures igh of the penitent as though it were am- al, who puts each tear of contrition into ottle.

The Jews.

The notes of J. W. L. upon the Jews were extremely interesting, and it may not be out of place to give Friends an account of a personal interview with John Wilkinson of London, who has felt called to do pioneer work in the circulation of the New Testaments amongst that people. One day, some few years ago, John was called to his mother's funeral a few miles from London, and whilst there he mentioned to his friends that he had received a letter from Scotland desiring him to be at home that day, as a gentleman wished to see him, and that he, John Wilkinson, was strangely impressed with the belief that this man wanted to give him five thousand dollars for the New Testament circulation amongst the Jews. When he returned to London he found this was the case, but the gentleman meeting a lady at his place, who wanted some money for a hospital in Asia Minor, he gave her three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, and left for J. Wilkinson twelve hundred and fifty. Subsequently this gentleman sent him twenty-five thousand dollars for the same purpose, and when that sum was about exhausted, John let it be known, and one day a lady called at his house, inquired about the matter, refused to give her name, but knelt down and offered prayer with him; and in a day or two he was informed by the Bank of England that there were twenty-five thousand dollars there to his credit. John never found out who she was. When the gentleman who gave the first twenty-five thousand heard of this, he was much distressed, claiming that John should have let him know his wants, and he would have sent him the money. The matter was eventually compromised by John's accepting another twenty-five thousand dollars and doubling his forces at work distributing and selling Testaments amongst the German, Russian and other Jews throughout the world. The day I called upon John Wilkinson he was about deciding what was best to do in the contested will case, for it seemed this gentleman had died and left his entire estate, about four hundred thousand dollars to John Wilkinson personally, to do what he should choose with it, though John knew very well that the intention was for him to expend the money in the circulation of the Scriptures amongst the Jews. Though the gentleman had been in London several times, he had always missed seeing John Wilkinson, I believe, and he had only received sixteen letters from him. He had been an India merchant, returned home to England or Scotland to live, and during the meetings held there by D. L. Moody had become convinced that the Christian life was the one to live, and entered upon it with full purpose of heart. John Wilkinson decided to allow the courts to decree whether this will should stand, he placing before them the evidence he had upon the subject, rather than compound the matter with the heirs, which they offered to do. The courts decided at last accounts that the funds should go to the family, the will being perfectly indefinite as to what the money should be used for, and John being of no kith or kin to him.

For many years John Wilkinson and his wife have lived upon the plan of giving away at the end of the month every penny they had; so at the beginning of each month they began afresh to bank upon God's mercies, and He has honored their plan, in that they have always had their need supplied and lived in proper comfort, at their home in Mild May, London, and their friends all over the world have found them a great joy and consolation.

The Conquering Tongue.

Whether England and America have place in prophecy or not, one thing is certain: the English language is to-day the dominant language of the earth, and its use is advancing with tremendous strides. A contemporary journal presents the following facts:

"English is written more than any other language. Statistics for 1898 emphasize the fact that more letters are written in English than all of the other languages together.

"To be more exact, three-fourths of all the letters that go into the mails of the world are in English. This remarkable fact is the more impressive when we remember that only about one-fourth of the civilized world speaks our language. There are substantially 500,000,000 persons who speak the ten chief modern tongues, and of these 150,000,000 speak English. But the number is increasing rapidly,—beyond all proportion as compared with the growth of other languages,—and as the English-speaking people increase in numbers, not only do the letters written in that language increase, but the number of letters per capita also increases.

"At the beginning of this century about twelve per cent. of the civilized world spoke English, at the middle of the century it was nineteen per cent., and now, at its close, it is thirty per cent. The increase in letter-writing has been far more rapid than this, and now out of the enormous number of 10,640,000,000 letters posted last year 8,000,000,000 were written in English.

"The march of intelligence headed by the English-speaking races, the wonderful decrease of illiteracy among them, and the demands of commerce, with these same races in its van, have brought this result. Commerce has extended the post-office system to all parts of the globe, into every nook and corner of the civilized world, and its language has been evolved from the English tongue. All races that enter into commerce of necessity learn more or less of the English language, and to some considerable extent carry on their business correspondence in English. Any one who goes among the native merchants of Hong Kong will be impressed by this fact.

"If you move with the world you must do it in English. Then, English-speaking persons write more letters because more of them know how to write, for while ninety-one per cent. of them have this accomplishment, but a little more than one-half of the persons speaking other modern languages can write their names. This is why the mail matter of the world for last year held thirty-one letters for each English-speaking person. German came next with twenty-four, and French followed with seventeen for each person.

"Next to the English, with its 8,000,000,000 letters written last year, comes the German with 1,300,000,000; French, 1,000,000,000; Italian, 220,000,000,; Russian, 180,000,000; Spanish, 120,000,000; Dutch, 100,000,000; Scandinavian, 80,000,000; and Portuguese, 24,000,000."

[From an old manuscript.]

It has been the work of the restless adversary of human happiness in all ages of the world to strive to keep man in or bring him into darkness. Those who are in it he strives to keep in it; he strives to captivate and beguile into it again; and his design in both is to prevent the enjoyment of the sweet flowings of the love of God and the powerful communications of the Holy Ghost. For he knows that these enjoyments are only witnessed in the light. He also knows the light would shine and prevail to the letting the soul into the full fruition of these Divine enjoyments, if he did not with all his might strive to propagate the kingdom and power of darkness in and over people's minds. Now the stratagems he makes use of are many and diverse; one of which and that not the least, it has been pressingly on my mind to write a few lines upon by way of caution to such as are desirous to land safe at last in the mansions of undisturbed felicity; but it feels or has felt difficult to express my mind so as to have my words go to the right place and do good. I have no desire to write one word on this occasion but what may be of use and tend to strengthen those desires and strivings which the Lord of hosts delighteth in and which if they prevail his blessing is unto. Therefore I desire that all prejudice may be laid aside, and my words weighed in that balance that ever is accompanied with just weight and tried by that ear that trieth words as the mouth tasteth meat. I know the subtlety of Satan is such that he will be apt to supply the carping mind with materials to overthrow the force of all persuasions and arguments and exhortations that the sincerest good can dictate or the greatest yearnings of bowels and travail of spirit for the welfare of souls inspire. However if the Lord shall please to impress the following on any mind to advantage, to Him be the praise; if not, with Him I leave it. The particular snare of the adversary that my mind is engaged to guard, caution and encourage against is this stumbling at the faults and failings of others. A potent engine, a powerful instrument which prevails by Satan's influence to the weakening the faith of many. Alas! alas! why will a spirit bound to eternity stumble over the failings of flesh and blood. Why will a soul that must finally settle accounts between God and itself spend time, waste time, to muse and despond at the infirmities of another? The frailties of a thousand cannot impair the unchangeable truth and righteousness of Jehovah. The hypocrisy of ten thousand cannot deprive the faithful, persevering soul of the all sufficient assistance of the mighty God of Jacob. It is an everlasting truth there is a right way to serve God; and though a multitude fall on the right hand and a host of those who have been as stars in the firmament revolt on the left, yet the wayfaring man though a fool cannot err in that way which the Lord hath cast up for the ransomed to walk in.

We are told that the dragon's tail drew a third part of the very stars from heaven. Was this told to stumble us? Surely nay, but still the cry is, "Come up hither and I will show thee the bride, the lamb's wife." Now the stumbler may say, "I have striven to see the bride. I have thought I have seen her, I have viewed her and her beauty fades away: her brightness disappears." But mark well, the call is "come up hither and I will show thee." It is not while we stand gazing at imperfections reasoning upon faults that we must expect this Divine prospect. No! no! but "come up hither" imports something very different from this halting, lingering behind, as it were sticking in the mire which my soul has truly mourned over and lamented. I think I am a living witness and can testify that there are some who have long ago been kindly visited and tenderly invited by the Lord to come and see how good He is; and who have even tasted in a degree of the sweetness of his love, who are yet far behind hand with their days' work are halting and doubting (may it not offend them) who are feeding on serpent's food, which was denounced by the lip of truth to be dust, and that all the days of his life. And I also believe under a feeling sense of Divine authority that nothing better shall be the food to all eternity of such as spend their days gazing at or stumbling over the failing of others; but I mean not to censure. 'Tis their immortal souls' welfare I have in view; therefore I would call them, yea, beseech and entreat them as they value their own immortal souls to come away, come away. This is not your rest. It surely is polluted. It is a land of darkness itself, the shadows of the evening, yea, the shadows of midnight are spread over the minds of the inhabitants thereof. Oh, sorrowful that any should love to dwell in utter darkness; that any should suffer their immortal souls to be made so easy a prey to the Dragon. What will it avail thee, O, soul, when thou comest before the great and final tribunal, to say such a man professed great sanctity, but was a hypocrite; therefore I was tempted to quit the service of the living God and serve his enemy; or such a one made profession of exalted piety, but was a liar and a deceiver. Therefore when I was somewhat washed I turned again to my wallowing in the mire. This will never justify thee at the gates of heaven, nor procure an admittance thereunto. Oh, my soul mourns on thy account. My spirit is indeed grieved. Come let me query with thee, Dost thou feel daily striving to overcome evil in thyself; art thou constantly concerned to keep up the inward watch and holy warfare? yea, let me come closer. Whilst thou art dwelling, musing and feeding upon the faults of others, art thou at the same time engaged and panting after perfection in thy own soul? Whilst thou art rehearsing to thy intimate friends the wanderings and the weaknesses of such and such, dost thou feel longing and unquenchable desires in thy mind to make war in righteousness. Truth it is to be feared, may with justice challenge the practice due from thy complaining. Oh that that eye was opened in thee that thou couldst see thyself; that thou hadst a heart to understand this mystery of iniquity. But alas, the adversary blinds thee, for why dost thou give back because of another's weakness instead of thy own. Why stumblest thou at another's faults but because thyself art frail. Make a pause then and turn thy attention inward. Set a watch upon the door of thy soul and keep attention there, then wilt thou have enough to do, to view thy own imperfections and so to guard against them as not to stumble at others. Work enough indeed may be found to engage all the care and diligence in labouring to cease from evil and do good thyself. Is less substantial than many a dream, to gain the victory over our own souls to our eneBecause others are entangled in his snare Shall I quit the field and turn my back in day of battle because a fellow-soldier is treaerous, cowardly or unfaithful when I know all is at stake, and if I flee I must perish Surely no! I ought rather to put forward with more zeal, vigilance and constancy, endeaving to encourage the fearful and unbelievi as knowing the salvation of their souls as as my own is at stake. Away then, thou r sooner, thou murderer with such pitiful musin and excuses. The day of solemn reckoni draws near. Oil on Troubled Waters.—The Ind was kept dry by the dripping of oil from bows; and although tremendous seas were ning and breaking, they could not co me board. This was certainly a most prac ic illustration of the old saying as to the "ping of oil on troubled waters"—a prover old as the Bible, but only very recently plied, thanks to the Hydrographic Office o United States, and now very generally follo by seamen the world over. It was an Ar can also (Redfield) who first thoroughly and explained the true character of these lving storms, and to him all seamen are ver indebted. In using oil, it is astonish- how small a quantity will suffice—just a 't or two in a bag stuffed with oakum hung the bows, and allowed to drip drop by on the sea, where it spreads out in a thin, sy film over the surface of the water. the film the wind slips, as it were, and no power to bank the water up into waves h would break over the ship. Hundreds eports are on file in the office attesting the vellous results of this simple agent of safe- -St. Nicholas.

COUNT THE MERCIES.

MARY D. JAMES.

Count the mercies! Count the mercies,
Number all the gifts of love;
Keep a daily, faithful record
Of the comforts from above,
Look at all the lovely green spots
In life's weary, desert way;
Think how many cooling fountains
Cheer our fainting heart each day.
Count the mercies! Count the mercies;
See them strewn along our way.

Count the mercies, though the trials
Seem to number more each day.
Count the trials, too, as mercies
Add them to the grand array;
Trials are God's richest blessings,
Sent to prompt our upward flight,
As the eagle's nest—all broken,
Makes them fly to loftier heights,
Count them mercies! Count them mercies,
That bring heaven within our sight.

Let us number all our jewels,
Let us estimate their worth;
Let us thank the gracious Giver,
Strewing blessings o'er the earth,
Let our hearts o'erflow with gladness
Let us tell the wonders o'er,
Till our multiplying treasures
Seem a countless, boundless store.
Then let praises, grateful praises,
Be our language evermore.

Joseph Hoag on War and Fighting.

In 1812, whilst Joseph Hoag was travelling in Tennessee, he says: We stopped on our way at Knoxville, to take breakfast; the Indians having made an invasion on the frontiers of the white inhabitants, it was a time of great alarm while I was there. Being taken into the room where the general was with his officers, the sergeants made their returns to the general, that they had warned every man that the law required to do military duty, Quakers and all, and there had not one Quaker appeared on the ground. In the meantime the general looked sharply at me, as I was walking the room, and said: "Well, we have lost a number of our frontier inhabitants and some of our soldiers, and a people who would not defend the frontier inhabitants when the savages were destroying and scalping them, could not be considered friends to their country, and should have no favor from him." He then said: "How do you like this doctrine, stranger?" I said: "It is no doctrine for me; I have little or no opinion of it." He asked: "Why?" I said: "The people with whom I commune, who are sound in their principles, are all King's men, and are remarkably attached to their King, and our King told Pontius Pilate that his kingdom was not of this world, for if it was, then would his servants fight, that He should not be delivered to the Jews; that his kingdom was not from hence, and that his kingdom was our kingdom; that He had nothing to fight for in this world, neither have we; and you warriors are fighting for riches, honor and glory of this world, and when you have got them, you cannot stay with them. We choose to lay up our riches, and have our treasures where the rust cannot mar them, nor thieves nor warriors get them from us." The general sat down, but soon rose with these words: "I am not going to give up the argument so; I see by the look in your eye that you are no coward; you are a soldier, and if an Indian was to come into your house to kill your wife and children, you would fight." I answered: "As for cowardice, I ever despised it, but," pointing towards the guns standing in the house with bayonets on them, "General it would take twelve such men as thou art—and then you would not do it—to make me take hold of a gun or pistol, to take the life of a fellow creature," and looked him full in the face. He said: "I see you do not deny the sword." I replied: "No, I profess to be a swordsman, that is the weapon I go into the field with—a sword that never was beaten in the field nor foiled in battle." He turned and sat down, but not long, and said: "I will bring you to the point. If an Indian was to come into your house with his knife and tomahawk, and you knew he would kill you, your wife and children, and you knew you could kill him and save all your lives, you would kill him; if you did not you would be guilty of the death of the whole." I thought it time to come to look for a close, and proposed a standard to bring the argument to, that should decide it, but he declined. I asked him if he professed to be a Christian, a Jew, or a Mahometan? He declined awhile. I then added, if he were a Jew, he was not prepared to fight; his men were not circumcised, he had not burnt a sin offering, nor a peace offering. He exclaimed: "I profess to be a Christian, I am not a Jew or a Turk." I asked him if he believed Jesus Christ was the author of the Christian dispensation. He said: "Yes." I asked him if he believed Him sufficiently equal to the work as God himself, as He received all the works of God to do. He said: "He did." I then told him I should keep him to the Christian platform or creed, laid down by Jesus Christ; and that he would not deny that a Christian was fit to live or die. I then told him I would give the subject a fair statement, and he might judge. I proceeded thus; "I shall state, that myself and wife are true Christians, and our children are in minority, and thou knowest it is natural for children to believe what their parents teach them, and therefore we are all true Christians as far as our several capacities enabled us to be; and now the question lies here; which is more like the precepts and example of our King—the author of the Christian religion—to lay down our lives, and all go to heaven together; or kill that wicked Indian and send him to hell; for he must be in as wicked a state as he can be, to kill a family that would not hurt him. General, it is a serious thing to send wicked folks to hell; they have no chance to come back and mend their ways; and thou dost not know but if that wicked Indian was spared, he might feel remorse enough to make him repent, so as to find forgiveness, and go to heaven. I really believe I should feel much better to see him come there, than to send him to hell; and that is not all, general; when I killed that wicked Indian, and sent him to hell, I imbrued my hands in human blood; before they were clean; but now they are stained deep in crimson gore, canst thou make thyself believe that I stand as good a chance to get to heaven, as to die when my hands were clean, and I innocent of human blood? And besides, our King who was Lord over all, had disciples and many women who looked up to Him for protection, as much as a wife to a husband, or children to their father. Did He, when the wicked Jews came out with staves to take Him, cut off those wicked creatures, and send them to hell, when

He could have the command of twelve legions of angels? He did not act without reason; He knew if He cut them off they would go to hell; and He knew if He laid down his life, He was going to heaven; and neither thou nor I knows but some of the poor creatures repented of their conduct, and found forgiveness and are now in heaven, glorifying his name for sparing them. Now general, was He guilty of suicide? Thou wilt answer; He came into the world for this purpose; I reply that we are brought into the world to obey his commands, and to follow his example, and do likewise if called on; and general, we find He had one soldier amongst his followers who drew his sword and fought like a valiant for his Lord. But what then said his Lord? did He say, thou art a good fellow, I will promote thee for this? or, did He not say, put up thy sword into its sheath, for they that use the sword shall perish with the sword? General thou wilt do well to remember that saying; it is the word of a King. The general made no answer, but sat and hung his head for some time; one of the company at length replied: "Well stranger, if all the world was of your mind, I would turn and follow after." I replied: "So then thou hast a mind to be the last man in the world to be good; I have a mind to be one of the first, and set the rest the example." This made the general smile. He got up and went out at the door, and ordered his officers to let me go where I pleased, and not to interfere; then turned and came in, I was then walking the floor, and after a little discourse, the general said: "Well stranger, there are a great many of your sort of people in this State." I answered: "Yes, and I hope thou finds them an honest, industrious, peaceful people; good inhabitants to populate and clear up a new country, and make it valuable." He said: "Yes, they are an industrious, harmless people." We were both on our feet, I turned, and looked him full in the face, and spoke with some emphasis: "General canst thou say that an honest, industrious people, who will harm nobody, are enemies to their country?" He paused awhile, and then said: "No, and they shall have my protection, and you have the word of a general for it." I then felt easy that all was done that could be done. I had the same man's word who had said: "No favor should be shown the Quakers," now pledge his honor to protect them.

PARAFFIN FROM THE OIL WELLS OF ASSAM.—Paraffin wax candles and the extreme north-eastern frontier of the Indian empire, declares the London Sketch, appear on first reflection to have but little connection with each other. The Digboi oil wells, however, situated in a remote corner of Assam, turn out, with their present small refinery and plant, 1,200 of these candles daily and should in the course of a few years, be capable of meeting any demand for oil and wax that is likely to arise.

Recent drilling operations, indeed, afford conclusive evidence that the territory may be made to yield at least 500,000 gallons a month of petroleum of excellent quality. There are now four wells at Digboi. The spectacle of four jets spouting black oil to a height of 70 feet supplies a striking picture of the resources of these wells. The oil falls into a natural reservoir, one end of which is artificially dammed up, and the supply is considerably in excess of the capacity of the existing refinery to work off. A suitable refinery on a larger scale is already in contemplation.

The enterprise has been pushed forward in the face of great difficulties and at great expense. Now that these difficulties have at last been successfully overcome, the prosperity of the Assam oil wells is assured, and the pioneers of the undertaking have every likelihood of reaping a rich harvest for their arduous struggle against malaria and jungle.

Politeness at the Expense of Sincerity.

A few years ago, the writer was present at a dreary "examination" of two boys in grammar, arithmetic, and other ordinary school studies. These things, not very interesting to a general audience, at any time, became exceedingly tedious as hour after hour dragged by, and, at length, the young governess, having called for the verbatim repetition of nearly the whole of Guyot's geography, turned and said, "Do not let us weary you. Tell us when you have had enough; you are not tired yet, I hope," with an air which said, "I know you desire a great deal more."

As the speaker paused, evidently expecting an answer, the small audience looked puzzled, when one lady relieved the embarrassment with infinite tact, by saying, "Pray do not interrupt your examination till you have fully satisfied yourselves and your pupils." The answer was given so politely and pleasantly that no one could be offended; but the hint was taken, and the "examination" soon closed, to the great relief of both pupils and audience.

It was the discussion of this little occurrence with a young clergyman who chanced to be among the audience that gave rise to an animated conversation concerning the propriety and morality of polite lying. Several, including the minister, asserted that both politeness and kindliness demand that we frequently say that which we do not mean, admire that which we do not like, assent to that which we do not agree, and, in many ways, speak and act lies to avoid wounding the feelings of others. One lady present, who immediately received the sobriquet of "Puritan," maintained that it is not necessary to say all that we think; nor to give an adverse opinion, unless it is positively called for; nor to obtrude our likes and dislikes, nor express our unfavorable criticism; but we should seek to find something which we can honestly admire and praise in every one; all shams and subterfuges, all seemings, which are not realities, and, especially, all words spoken with intent to deceive, should be called, in plain Saxon, lies, and be so regarded, and no amount of kindliness of purpose can change their moral character.

The writer listened to the discussion, and it seemed to her that this tampering with the divinest of attributes—truth—touched principles, and had results far beneath the frothy surface of conventionality, and accounted for many things which plain, honest observers see to deplore and condemn in the developments of our social life.—Zion's Watchman.

BAD books and bad plays give people a chance to commit in thought those sins which they dare not commit in deed.

A Volume of Old Quaker Literature.

Once in a while, a volume of seventeen century Quaker literature not yet to be fo on the shelves of the Reference Library un the care of the Meeting for Sufferings co to the light, and is, if possible, secured a welcome addition to the most complete libr of its kind in existence.

Such a book is "The great cry of oppressi or a Brief Relation of some part of the suff ings of the people of God in scorn called Quake in Ireland for these eleven years, viz., from beginning of 1671 until the end of 1681. vided into two Heads. The above quotation, which is a fair spe men of the title of the seventeenth-cent religious book or pamphlet, by no means hausts the title-page. A reference is n made to a "testimony against taking and p ing of Tythes," after which are quoted se Scripture extracts, with the reference to ch ter and verse in each case.

The book, which bears no printer's na was printed in 1683, and was "Written by who in obedience to the Lord's call is come of Mistery Babylon, and is known by the na of William Stockdale." From Joseph Smit catalogue we learn that William Stockdale of Charlemont Meeting, in the North of Irela that he died in Pennsylvania, the interm taking place at Philadelphia, the twenty-th of Seventh Month, 1693. From his pref and testimony against Tythes, he appears to a man of some learning, familiar with "div Antient and Modern Writers," as well as w the Scriptures.

The value of the book depends upon amount of information contained in it whic not to be found in Besse's Sufferings. A c sory glance at the Irish index of the lat shows that many of William Stockdale's fellow-sufferers are not named therein, or that the sufferings which he records are additional to th mentioned by Besse. It would be interest to know whether Friends well versed in history of Friends in Ireland are acquain with this book, and can give information a its use by writers on the subject.

The sufferers mentioned are spread o three-quarters of the Irish counties, inclu "Ardmagh" and "Catherlough," and from t agricultural produce was usually taken. we find the "Tithe-monger" took loads "Hey," car-loads of oats, so many stook wheat, barley, or oats, varied sometimes cow, pig, or bullock, garden produce, house utensils, such as a warming-pan and pe dishes, shop goods, such as serge, French l leather, tobacco, and cheese, whilst not it quently the "shop-box" was visited and m abstracted therefrom. This will be exploitation in its truest sense, and its accomplishment will be a verification of the ancient saying that "Egypt is the Nile and the Nile is Egypt."

The Gift of Listening to God.

The following is reprinted at the suggestion of a valued correspondent.

DEAF children are always dumb. It is not possible for a child to speak human language until he has heard it spoken. We speak because we have heard. The same law is true in spiritual things. It is not possible to communicate until we have heard. The great voices that "cry" to our generation, or to any other generation, the men that are reaching the ears and the hearts of the people, the message-bearers of our time, or any other time, must first have listened and heard. The word "prophet" means one who "speaks for" God. A prophet is dumb until he hears God; he opens his lips only when he hears.

These are very old truths, and probably everybody agrees that they are true in the abstract, but yet they are very much ignored and neglected in fact. It seems to us that one of the supreme gifts conferred upon man is the gift of listening to God, but it is a gift which is sadly neglected, and through this neglect the spiritual life of the individual and of the church suffers loss.

There has been among Friends a strong reaction from "silent meetings" because they proved lifeless and profitless to most persons. They seemed dead and formal to all but an elect few, and meetings where there were no vital messages slowly diminished until they ceased to be. The result was that the pendulum swung to the opposite extreme, as so often happens, and silence became "a byword and a hissing," and a synonym for deadness and conservatism. Then, too, there was a practical difficulty. The times of silence gave occasion for all the unbalanced and undesirable speakers "to free their minds" at the expense of the patient congregation. The easy remedy seemed to be to have the time "filled" either with singing or with "profitable speaking." The result is that "the meeting for worship" which our fathers knew is going out of existence, and in its place we are getting "preaching meetings," "prayer meetings," praise meetings," and "testimony meetings." The great fact remains that there is no greater gift than the gift of listening to God, and that there is no greater spiritual power than that which comes when a whole congregation is fused and melted in silent waiting and soul worship before the living God, when God's presence can be felt and His voice heard so distinctly that no audible words are needed.

There is nothing the Christian Church more needs than such living, convincing worship, and such times of holy hush before the Father of spirits, but it is apparently becoming a "lost gift," and there are many Friends who do not believe there is anything in silence. Of course there is not anything in empty silence, nor is there anything in empty speaking, but it is certain that we shall never get prophets, until we learn to listen, and we shall never get mighty, convincing messages which make the congregation vibrate like "harps of God" until we learn to worship together in living silence. —American Friend.

It takes a steady hand to hold a cup full of blessings.

Items Concerning the Society.

Eliza H. Varney, within the hour of her return from her visit to the Dukhobors in the far West, proceeded to her Monthly Meeting at Bloomfield, Canada, where she laid before her friends a concern for some time dwelt under to visit in Gospel love the meetings and members in California and along the Pacific coast. This received the approval of the meeting, and on the 8th instant of her Quarterly Meeting also, held at Athens. Accordingly she is released for this distant service.

Notes from Others.

What is said to be the "only Christian daily newspaper in the world" is to be found in Montreal, where it was established over half a century before the author of "In His Steps" painted the imaginary difficulties of such a journal. The paper, the Montreal Witness, has been in existence fifty-four years, and has a constituency of two hundred thousand readers. It has from the first refused advertisements of strong drink, tobacco, theatres and quack medicines, and thus sacrifices at least fifty thousand dollars a year. And yet it is a splendid success.—Ex.

Recent excavations have brought to light the letters of the great King Khammurabi, who lived about 2300 B. C., and claimed for himself the title of the "Builder of the Empire," of Babylonia.

They are the oldest letters in the world, and are inscribed on clay tablets three inches long by two wide. Some forty-six of these were addressed to a petty ruler of the city of Larsa, and belong to the period assigned to the migration of Abram.

The king gives orders about bringing the local divinities into the city before his arrival and after that was proved obnoxious to the natives, he ordered them restored to their former shrines, also directing the movement of his battalions. To the student of Biblical history, these early records are of great importance.

One evening, a short time ago, a society in Jefferson needed a gallon of cream. The committee called up by telephone the proprietors of a milk farm two miles north of the town, and asked if they could furnish it. The reply was that they could as soon as milking was done. In thirty minutes from the time the call was made the cream was delivered.

The milk had been drawn from the cow, put into a separator, the cream extracted and sent to town by a man on a bicycle.

A few years ago the committee would have had to send a boy in the afternoon, "yesterday's milk" would have had to be skimmed, and if the boy had not treed too many chipmunks on the way, he might have got back in time for the festival.—Ashtabula Sentinel.

Each of the early Christian communities, says the Bishop of Hereford, of the English Established Church, was simply a Christian brotherhood, its government democratic in life and spirit. The words in the twentieth chapter of John on the remission of sins were addressed to the whole body of disciples, not the apostles only, and that might, as he believed, include women as well as men. Again, it was the whole body of believers upon whose judgment depended the critical decision recorded in the fifteenth of Acts. Further, in those early communities, in the language of such letters as those of the Apostle Paul, they had abundant evidence, said the bishop, that the organization of the Christian ministration was not what it was to-day; that there was no distinct separation between the clergy and the laity, that there was no order holding clerical offices, but there was the equal call of God to all alike to perform some spiritual function, some one and some another, according to the gift and the calling. Apostles, prophets, evangelists, overseers or bishops, presbyters, deacons, pastors, teachers, ministers, helpers, interpreters, stewards, were not separate bodies of men in the Church so much as men endowed with special gifts and performing special functions.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total wealth of the United States will be nearly $100,000,000,000 when the next century begins, and since the country has grown so rich we have become one of the first among nations that seek investment in foreign lands.

For the quarter ending Ninth Month 30th last, the increase over the corresponding quarter last year in the issue of postage stamps, stamped envelopes and postal cards amounted to almost 14 per cent.

W. F. Menninger, of Chicago, in an address in New York City to the Convention of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, said: "There are six hundred churches and seven thousand saloons in Chicago. You could stand in front of almost any one of those churches and throw a stone through the window of the apartments of some disorderly woman. Out of two million persons in that city only 186,000 ever step foot inside of a church. And those who go to church go only on Sunday, and they get a mighty small dose then. I happened to be at the service in one fashionable church recently, and the pastor apologized for preaching so long. I timed him, and the sermon took exactly twenty-two minutes. Yet all the great preachers and professors go to Chicago, and we have lots of silver tongued pulpit orators of our own. I think some of them must have tongues of gold, they cost so much."

Nearly 2,000,000 copies of the Bible were printed in New York last year.

conscientious attention to the monitions penings of the light of Christ, the true and holy witness of his Spirit in the heart, has resulted in a series of doctrines and practices seeming to be inseparable from faithfulness to the witness for Truth. They are not appendages to the Christian life, but evolutions from it. There is not one of them that we would adhere to, except as it has its foundation in Truth; or not one of the acts of conformity with the world that we would bear testimony against, except as it has not its foundation in Truth.

A conscientious dependence on the witness of the Spirit for all religious work and worship consistently pursued, must make us peculiar and differentiate us from churches where such waiting on the Lord is not practically the rule of church conduct.

It has also given us a goodly heritage of advantages in membership with such a Society, and in generally respected character, which many learn to appreciate, and some covet to join.

What is called "joining Friends" we fear too largely means just that—joining Friends, and not their doctrines and principles. They continue strangers to the true spiritual right of membership, their interest in the Society, if continuing, being held on personal and social considerations. The Society, swelled, but not strengthened, by the addition of such as these, carries them as parasites, attracted to its membership not to be testimony bearers of its principles, but to enjoy advantages comparable to the loaves and fishes for which many followed Jesus. Candidates for admission need a deeper reason than that "it is a good Society to belong to," and they need more of a qualification than the Gospel minus that completing principle in which we stand for the Gospel.

We hear it said of candidates sometimes, "To be sure they are not much Friends in principle, but we will take them in, in the hope that they will learn our views as their membership goes on." This hope should be called a speculation. Once securely admitted, the candidate finds that the need of preparation for that boon has expired, and we do not find members taking the pains to indoctrinate him much afterwards. Those who do come in on the right ground are usually our staunchest members. But those who join the Society, and not its principles, are, so long as the nominal membership lasts, an element of weakness.

IF any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth. (1 Peter iv: 2.)

Notes of a Visit to Doukhobor Villages.

BY JOB S. GIDLEY.

On Seventh-day morning, the fifth of the Eighth Month, we visited the two villages on the Swan River, which we had passed by on the previous day. One of these was near to the ford, the other was a mile or more further up the stream, but on the same side. To save two or three miles drive for our horses, we had sent word the day before to the people living at the latter place that we proposed, the next day, to pass over the trail on the south side of their village, and that we would be pleased to have them come and meet us if they desired to do so. Having made a satisfactory visit at the village near the ford, we proceeded on our way up the hills, through the "brush," for a mile or more where we saw a few Doukhobor men and women on the trail who had come to meet us.

They turned and followed us. When we reached the top of a hill, in sight of the open prairie, which is at the south of the village referred to, we saw a fine company of Doukhobor men and women, standing together in the bright sunshine, all dressed in their best attire. When we got within hearing distance we found that they were chanting a plaintive melody. It was truly an impressive sight.

When we reached them they soon ceased singing, and a sweet, solemn silence ensued, which was broken by a supplication by E. H. V., this being followed by testimonies, which were listened to with close attention.

One must be void of feeling not to be touched by such a scene. Here was a meeting for worship held upon the prairie, under the canopy of heaven, where the Dispenser of our manifold blessings seemed near at hand. It brought to mind thoughts of the simple way in which the early Christians performed their worship.

After our meeting was over, a few of the women went to their village to get something for us, presenting a nice handkerchief to E. H. V. and another to myself. As we took leave of them they began again singing one of their Russian psalms.

We thought to stop on our way from this place to Fort Pelly, and feed our horses and partake of refreshments, but, it being very dry, there was no suitable place to get water for ourselves and horses, so we made no halt before reaching Pelly, about the middle of the afternoon, tired and hungry, having ridden about thirty miles, according to the driver's estimate, the longest continuous journey that we took.

We stopped this time at E. A. W. R. McKenzie's, whose daughter, about twelve years of age, soon had a bountiful luncheon prepared for us, by which we were greatly refreshed.

After resting a little we left for the Assiniboine River, about half a mile away, where we were so much delayed on our outward journey. The ford was soon reached and crossed in safety, and, after a drive of about two hours, we reached the village near White Sand River, visited on the first instant. Here we saw fields of rye, oats and barley, all looking well. The next morning, after having had a religious opportunity with the people, we bade them an affectionate farewell, not knowing whether we would ever meet them again. Some of them, however, went with us to the next village, where we took our mid-day lunch, and had the second meeting of the day.

Here we saw Nastasia Verigin, who told us that she had three sons who have been exiles in Siberia for several years. She is eighty-three years of age. She pleaded with us to do all in our power to have these exiles liberated, that they might return to their people. Judging from their pictures, which were shown us, these looked as if they might be numbered among the best of this long-persecuted people. We saw the wife and two daughters of one of them, and fine-looking people they were. The daughters were nearly grown to womanhood. While sitting in their house, in silent waiting among them, just before leaving, E. H. V. appeared in supplication, craving that the Most High would soften the heart of the Czar to let these people go, for vain is the help of man. The Doukhobors were also encouraged to put their faith and hope in God, and to remember that if "ye have faith, even as a grain of mustard seed, ye may say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove."

Before leaving this house, while we were seated on the piazza in the sunlight, a half-dozen little Doukhobor boys, whose ages ranged from five to seven years, stood before us, and each in turn recited a Russian psalm, after which I showed each how to count ten in English, using his fingers as counters. A few minutes later each one came to me and counted in the same way without making a single mistake.

I hardly expected to see a piazza attached to a log-house, but we saw quite a number of them in different places. This house, taken throughout, was the best arranged and best finished of any that we saw. It even had a good cellar under one end, about ten by fifteen feet, and six or seven feet in depth. This was the only cellar seen under any of their houses.

After visiting the next camp, a mile or a little more further towards the west, and holding a meeting with the people, we took a circuitous route towards the east and south, re-crossed White Sand River by the bridge, travelled a long distance, and reached the largest village of Doukhobors, north of Yorkton, which is sometimes called "Winter Quarters." Here we found about six hundred people.

A considerable number collected together on our arrival, in the west part of their camp, where we held a meeting that was felt to be a tendering season of Divine favor.

We then proceeded to the east side of their village, where we met the patriarch of the Doukhobors, John Machortoff, who told us that in his youth he saw two Friends in Russia. He took supper with us, in the nurse's tent.

In the evening there was another meeting, which was even larger than the one held in the afternoon, it being the fifth meeting held during the day. E. H. V., in her supplication at the last meeting, rendered thanksgiving for the manifold favors of the day.

After visiting all the other camps, save one, on White Sand River, and holding a meeting at each village, we reached Yorkton late Fifth-day evening, the tenth of the Eighth Month.

On Seventh-day, the twelfth, we left Yorkton for Good Spirit Lake, at the north and east of which are seven villages of Doukhobors; Herbert P. Archer, one of the committee appointed by the Canadian government, accompanying us. We reached the first village, some thirty miles or more from Yorkton, late in the afternoon, and spent the night there. The next day we visited and held meetings in four villages, then drove about a mile further north, where lived Robert Buchanan and his wife, who are much interested in the Doukhobors. One of our drivers had formerly lived here, and recommended it as an excellent place for us to spend the night, which we found to be true on accepting their kind invitation to remain with them. Learning of a village about a mile to the north of this place, as the sun was still above the western horizon, I wandered off toward the Doukhobor camp. As I passed alone around among their houses and tents, although I could not understand much of their language, yet by a few simple words and signs I found that they were in Halifax last winter, and that they recognized me.

One man invited me to stay all night with him. This he did by laying his head in his hand, inclining his body and pointing toward his tent. I thanked him, and replied that we would visit them on the morrow.

In the morning Robert Buchanan started for his hay field, but his wife went with us to the village already alluded to, and I noticed that she was gladly welcomed among the Doukhobors. After holding a meeting at this village we visited the other two, where we also held meetings, and returned to Robert Buchanan's.

On Third-day morning we turned our faces homeward, stopping at a farmer's by the name of Hutchinson, who formerly lived in England, and is a member of the Society of Friends. His family consists of a wife and three children, and a young Doukhobor woman in their employ.

This farmer has a nice garden, and succeeds in raising an early variety of sweet corn. We saw some nearly ready for the table. This was the only corn of any considerable size seen north of Yorkton.

We reached Yorkton before nightfall, having been away four days.

Although the Doukhobors have been seriously handicapped in having so little to do with, they have nevertheless made an excellent beginning, and one is greatly impressed by seeing what they have accomplished in building their houses, sawing their lumber (by hand), making bricks, plowing their lands, cutting and stacking their hay, and in attending to various other duties. They are a peculiar people, worthy of the favorable consideration of every lover of peace and goodwill in our land. Doubtless there will be suffering among them this winter, unless they receive assistance from those who are charitably inclined.

Their needs are many and various. Their houses were unfinished, most of them lacking windows. Very few families are supplied any kind of artificial light. A supply of o food than bread would benefit them greatl

I see no reason why they will not be ab succeed in the home of their adoption, if are carried safely through one or two wi by the assistance of those who are intere in their welfare.

Western Yearly Meeting.

Western Yearly Meeting convened on Seve day, Ninth Month 30th, with the Meeting Sufferings and the Meeting of Ministers Elders at two P. M. Most of the members stituting these meetings were present at meetings, with visiting Friends from Kansas, and North Carolina Yearly Meeti much sympathy was felt and expressed fo dear Friends in North Carolina, who, fro sense of duty are endeavoring to uphold t precious truths taught by Christ and his apo and maintained through much suffering o early Friends. The language might be a cable to-day, as it was when the apostle addressed the church at Rome, "For he is a Jew which is one outwardly, neither is circumcision which is outward in the flesh; he is a Jew which is one inwardly and cumcision is that of the heart, in the s and not in the letter, whose praise is n men but of God." For it seems as though name of Friend or Quaker has been covete cloak many inconsistencies, and we fear brought a reproach on the once good nam

The two meetings on First-day were attended, and the ministering servants enabled to hand forth in gospel life, messa to the comfort and edification of the gath assembly. Too many make mistakes by lis ing to the "lo here" and "lo there," be seeking unto God in retirement, to know will concerning them. Jesus said on that g day of the feast, "If any man thirst, let come unto me and drink." Oh, come away the leadings of men, and come in retire unto God. Earnest entreaty was made to heed to this Scriptural doctrine of the i pensable agency of the Spirit or grace of manifest in the heart in obtaining a sa knowledge of the gospel of Christ. Its lute need in every stage of the work of s tion and in every service of God, which w insisted on by our early Friends and has acterized the faith of our religious Soc cannot be lightly esteemed by any who profess with us. We esteem a true G ministry a great blessing, and heartily the language of the prophet, that "they turn many to righteousness shall shine a stars for ever and ever." But there is no cept or command for a hired ministry written sermon.

The reading of the Answers to the Qu gave evidence of many deficiencies, whi a cause of deep regret to the faithfu sincere in heart. So great a desire for w gain weans the soul from paying tribute best interest.

A neglect of attending meetings for w was noted, and especially in the middle week, as a natural result of lack of Chr love. A close and humble walk with G remove all deficiencies and preserve fr snares that lie in wait to catch the y'ou atchful. A lively concern as needed for better establishment of schools under the of the Society was revived, and it was ted out that the welfare and prosperity of beloved Society is intimately connected this subject, and also with making the ren better acquainted with the works ap- ed by our religious Society, in which the rines and testimonies of the Gospel, as by Friends, are set forth. We believe the ne blessing would attend the steady pur- of such a course, and the children be often ght under an abiding sense of the respon- ty resting upon them.

the early gathering of this assembly an est concern was felt by many hearts that great Master of Assemblies would conde- l to lead and direct in the deliberations of neetings; and as we drew towards a con- on, our minds were humbled under the re- brance that our Heavenly Father had been ed to grant his presence in our midst.

Samuel Capper's Visit.

Seventh-day we were called upon by Edward sell and —— McIntosh, two preachers eachers amongst the Plymouth Brethren; conversation was mostly with Robert lton and John Cadbury, in which they as- d that the people had become more wicked they had adopted temperance habits; and me other points they advanced, asserted maintained by the most futile arguments sentiments at variance with facts.

rst-day, the twenty-ninth we had a public ing in the Linen-hall, very different in its bers from those we have already had; it composed of about thirty Friends, fifty estants and twenty Romanists—we were that the Romish bishop had issued that his special commands that none of the le should attend.

gain, on the thirtieth, we had another ing in the Linen-hall; the attendance about st. These meetings, although small, were, e, attended by the Master of assemblies the precious gathering arm of his love nded over us.

the thirtieth we held our last meeting in rick at Bohrbuey, a very uncivilized part ne town or suburbs. About one hundred ons came into the tent. These people be- d very well, indeed were very attentive, pting a poor crazy man, who fell upon his and beat her. It was, however, a good ing, though the people who remained out- the yard, and would not come in, made iderable noise, from, I apprehend, the vledge that the priests were vexed at the ing being held. If I am not mistaken, an iring spirit has been awakened in these people, priest ridden as they are, which it of the Power of Romish emissaries to her, and I trust that their desire after tual light may have been favored by these rtunities. One strong indication of the prostrate and paralyzed state of the Romish uasion is the more subdued and subtle e of treatment which the priests resort to, appress the growing desire for information light; for example we have not heard here ursing us from the altar, which was not mmon; we have not seen a horsewhip used rive the people away from our meetings, which was not very uncommon a few years ago. It was a little singular that —— McGrath, the high constable, attended, I believe, every one of the meetings held under the tent in Limerick, except the first, and behaved with the greatest propriety and kindness—he is a Romanist.

The meeting held in the tent at Adare second of Sixth Month, was a sweet and satisfactory opportunity; the priest did not appear to be disposed to use much effort to prevent the people attending; although the village is small we had about two hundred at meeting; about seventy or eighty were of the ancient German Palatines, who fled from Germany about sixty years ago, a superior order of people and Protestants and many Friends from Limerick were at this meeting. The Friends who assisted on this excursion were, William Alexander, Samuel Alexander, Samuel Alexander, Jr., Edward Fitt and Joseph Newsom, besides John Cadbury and Robert Charlton.

The preacher of the Baptist congregation at Limerick, G. N. Watson, was at this meeting, and the minister of the established church at Adare, and sat near me. I thought it might be said that Truth reigned over all. I followed the Friends who went to prepare for the meeting at Rathkeale, and found the tent erected in a brewery yard ; one of these establishments, like many others, fast going to decay. The people were very willing to come, but we saw the priest near the meeting-place endeavoring, by his presence, to overawe such as were inclined to enter, and deter them. A few persons, about thirty, came in with us, and in about a quarter of an hour about sixty or seventy more. They were all Romanists, and came in companies of eight to twelve, entering with impetuosity, as though after a struggle with their fears of the priest, and the absurd tenderness of their consciences ; they appeared overcome by the desire of being present. We had a good meeting, several of rather the higher class of persons were present. I felt oppressed and weighed down with the horrible darkness of Popery in this and other places ; it seems almost impenetrable, but we know not the day, nor the hour, nor the means by which it may please the great head of the church to dissipate this thick cloud ; we have only to be found watching to know our duty, and faithful to discharge it.

We reached Newcastle on the Third, about two o'clock, and found that a very suitable place, a deserted brewery again, had been obtained, and that no difficulty in any preparative measure had occurred, but when the time arrived for giving notice of the meeting, our friends were soon made aware that a spirit of enmity and malignity was rife amongst the people. Our fame had preceded us, and the priest, who was called Tom Collins, was diligent in his endeavor to prevent any persons from attending, and if we judge from results, in his instructions for our annoyance. At the hour appointed for the meeting we found few if any persons in the tent, but after the lapse of about a quarter of an hour there might be fifty persons there, many or most of whom were Romanists, and at various intervals persons came in the manner described at Rathkeale, until we had one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty persons present. All in the tent were very still, and many of them intensely attentive ; the entrance to the tent was up a long passage between walls, and the crowd of poor, deluded persons, mostly young, who would not come in, and endeavored to keep others from doing so, made a great tumult, which, however, but little disturbed those in the tent. When the meeting broke up, Samuel Alexander and I walked back to the inn, followed by hundreds of children and young people, who yelled and shouted, so that the reverberation through my ears was like the sound of a large church bell very near me. About half an hour after when our friends, John Cadbury, Robert Charlton, Edward Fitt and Samuel Alexander, Jr., were returning, after taking down the tent, the yelling was still more deafening, and as it was growing a little dark the people were so worked upon as to throw stones ; several struck the friends, but without doing any injury, except in one instance ; this struck John Cadbury a little behind and below the left ear, slightly stunning him and scratching the flesh.

On the Fourth we rode from Newcastle to Tralee, a distance of about thirty-eight English miles, and passed through Abbyfail and Castle's Island, both miserable Popish towns, dark and degraded beyond my power to describe. At the former we made a halt, as I had had thoughts of a meeting there, but we found that the people were at all times very excitable, and now had been excited by the priest, who had heard of our coming ; and seeing the very short time which we had for our operations, and the alarm of the resident magistrate, William Cooke, we felt it best to pass on, at least for the present.

On the Fifth of Sixth Month we had a solemn and earnest meeting in the Methodist Chapel at Tralee, at half-past six o'clock ; there were probably about three hundred present, one-third it may be Romanists. The meeting gathered irregularly, and many went in and out during most of the time ; some appeared very insensible of the importance and awfulness of the purpose for which we were met, yet some there were sincere seekers and covenant makers ; some also who were covenant breakers, and some whose conflicts were and had been very great. I had some solid peace in the holding of this meeting, though I travel about every day with a sense of the burden of darkness and profligacy which abound ; the spiritual atmosphere seems tainted by the sensuality and malignity of many of the priests.

On the Sixth of Sixth Month the friends sought diligently for an enclosed yard to put up the tent in, but without success, as though there were several very eligible which belonged to Protestants, yet they were so fearful of injury in the way of their business, that they would not permit us to use them ; they, however, recommended our trying the milk market, a spacious enclosure, but it being not well protected and open to the public we were doubtful whether we could effect our purpose ; but —— Fitzgerald, a merchant, and —— Hickson, a timber dealer, expressed their full conviction that we should be able to hold our meeting without the slightest interruption ; the tent was accordingly set up, but the priests' opposition was soon manifested through their agents upon the lower class of people. An hour before the appointed time of the meeting, several friends became apprehensive that the meeting could not be held. There appeared a disposition to demolish the tent, and therefore, after some of us had sat a few minutes quietly in the tent, whilst all the rest were kept busy in preserving it standing, we found it best to relinquish our intention at this time. There was a stronger indication here of malevolent feelings against those whom they call heretics than I have seen elsewhere; it is quite clear that Popery is the same now as it was in former times, or in the reign of Queen Mary. Oh! the darkness of these priests; the people would be very accessible if it were not for them.

Sensitive Ears.

It is told that a telegraph operator at Springfield, Mass., was kept at his post of duty for many hours receiving special news. After losing two nights' sleep, he was relieved from duty to get some rest. He went to his room at the hotel and soon was fast asleep. When the time came for him to return to his instrument he could not be awakened. Loud pounding on the door did not result in arousing him. An operator then, with his knife-handle, tapped "Springfield" on the door, in imitation of the clicking of the instrument. At once the sleeping operator sprang from his bed, and was soon ready to continue his work.

It is said that firemen hear in their sleep the signal calling them to duty, while they sleep right through any number of signals which do not concern them. In an article on "Heroes Who Fight Fire," in the Century, Jacob A. Riis tells of a fire-department chief who has a gong right over his head at his home, every stroke of which he hears, although he never hears the baby; while his wife hears the baby if it so much as stirs in its crib, but does not hear the gong.

We hear that for which we listen. The sensitive soul, attuned to hear the voice of God, is surrounded by distracting noises of all kinds, and yet it responds instantly to the call of duty or to words of warning. The gentlest whisper of conscience is sufficient to call to action the one who has trained himself to hear that voice. A single manifestation of God's Word is a louder call than all the noises of the world to the one who trains himself to obey that voice.—The Christian Guardian.

Skin-Grafting.—In a recent clinical lecture, Dr. Stewart McGuire exhibited a patient who illustrated the facts that skin grafts do not always acquire the color of the individual on whom they grow. "Some of you," said the lecturer, as quoted in the Southern Medical Record, "will remember this negro, whose leg was amputated in the clinic over a year ago. Owing to an effort to save too much of the limb, sloughing occurred in the flaps, and a raw, granulating surface resulted over six inches in diameter. You will recollect that as soon as active suppuration ceased he was brought before you again, and the defect covered by Thiersch's method of skin-grafting. Usually skin-grafts are cut from the individual's thigh, but in this instance they were taken from the leg of a white man which had been amputated a few moments before. I remember telling you that it seemed a shame to mutilate black skin when so much white skin was going to waste, and expressed my belief, based on the investigation of Karg, that pigmentation would occur and that the white skin would gradually become black. The operation of skin grafting was a perfect success, and the patient was discharged in two weeks with a well healed stump. He comes back for exhibition to-day. The artificially formed cuticle is firm, pliable and painless, but as white as the day it was implanted. Fortunately, owing to its position, it is a matter of no consequence. Had it been upon the face, and had the colors been reversed there might be a lively suit for malpractice."

Testimony of Lurgan Monthly Meeting, Concerning Charles F. Wakefield, a Minister, Deceased.

Charles Frederick Wakefield, son of Thomas Christy and Jane S. Wakefield, of Moyallon, County Down, was born on the twelfth day of First Month, 1807. He was the youngest son in a large family consisting of three sons and eight daughters. His father was an influential member of the Society of Friends, and his mother, whose maiden name was Jane S. Goff, of County Wexford, proved a true helpmeet to her husband, and was indeed "a mother in Israel." She remained fresh in the memory of her son all his lifetime, and her husband has borne testimony to her worth in the following words:

"A better wife no man ever had. Her heart overflowed with love to me, and all around; her mind was stayed upon her God. Our children were tenderly brought up, and she was enshrined in their memory as a wise and loving parent."

In this Christian home Charles F. Wakefield grew up to manhood. His earliest recollections were of having learned to say "Our Father" at his mother's knee; but, notwithstanding these early associations, and the continuance of a mother's prayers, he remained "an alien from the commonwealth of Israel, and a stranger from the covenant of promise."

After his return from school he was placed by his father in the linen business, where, in his intercourse with the world and with outside companions, he gradually developed a passion for field sports and a love for mixing with gay company. Here his attractive appearance and manners always made him a welcome companion, and although during this period of thoughtless gayety he was saved from open vice, his parents were under much concern for his soul's welfare, and his mother continued to wrestle in prayer for her beloved son.

With his brothers and sisters he regularly attended Meeting for Worship in Moyallon from a very early age, a custom which was continued even when his heart was taken up with the world and worldly things. When about twenty-six years of age the great crisis of his life was reached, which we prefer to describe in his own words, as told to a relative about two years before his death. On asking for particulars he replied:

"Yes, I well remember the day; it was in Moyallon Meeting-house. Dear Stephen Grellet in his ministry laid my state open and bare. He then told us if we did not yield to the call of our Heavenly Father the consequences would be very sad. He proceeded to say: 'I see as it were a sword drawn, and it is about to fall if there is any hesitation on the part of an individual present to come out on the Lor side.' I sat bowed to the ground; I knew words had reference to my case. Blackn and darkness seemed before me, and I belie it would be my last call. There and the yielded entirely to the power that spoke to through my dear friend, and made no reser

Dear Stephen Gre took me with him to the south of Ireland, greatly confirmed me by his preaching and love. In that journey a friend of mine myself received a distinct call to the minis of the Gospel; through great mercy I yield but in the other case it was different, and and sorrow were the result. I cannot su ciently praise and magnify the kindness love of my Heavenly Father. I know I sho not be here to-day had I not entered his s vice, and I can at least tell others that He been a good and gracious Master."

This occurred during Stephen Grellet's v to this country in 1833. Having thus definit yielded body, soul and spirit in obedience the heavenly call, C. F. Wakefield never swer in his purpose of dedication; and was afte time recorded a minister of the Gospel in Society of Friends, viz: on seventh of Sec Month, 1839.

In 1839 he married Anne Moore, of Clon also a recorded minister, who had previo been engaged in visiting meetings in Uls She was his senior in years, but being un in spirit and service, their lives blended swe together upon earth for a period of over f years. At the time of their marriage settled at Portadown, and continued to re there until separated by death.

His ministry was often doctrinal, and clear on the foundation truths of our faith hope in the mercy of God through his bl Son. He was frequently led to speak o baptism of Christ, as distinguished from baptism of water, which John the forert had proclaimed; and very often it seeme duty to point out the privilege which th r enjoys in the spiritual breaking of the d of Life; and the text was a familiar one s hearers: "Behold, I stand at the door nock; if any man hear my voice, and open door, I will come into him, and will sup him, and he with me," showing how we become spiritual communicants at the e of the Lord. How often, too, our dear d endeavored to impress upon his hearers ruth of the universality of Divine Grace, the all-importance of that one offering e on Calvary for the sins of the whole

d. His words seemed to pour out through lips from a loving heart, and even the ren present were seldom forgotten, as he aled to them to give their young lives to loving Saviour, who said: "Suffer little ren to come unto me, and forbid them not, f such is the kingdom of heaven." In later s his spirit was more and more an exemcation of the Apostle John's words, "He say he died in harness, as the minute re-eighty-seven years. His last exercise in ministry was in Lurgan, where the Word e seemed no power to rally.

e was often engaged in prayer and thanks-ng, and those around him could say that promise was fulfilled, "at evening time it

th mentioning; many times he exclaimed:
ie Lord's mercies to me have been wonder-l—wonderful to a poor unworthy servant;
my only hope is in the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." Gratitude for the kind attention of those around him was tenderly expressed.

On the last morning his mind seemed wandering a little, and when a dear relative entered the room, he exclaimed, as he drew her down for a fond embrace, "My dear child, thou hast come, and my dear mother has come also," so strong in death was the memory of that beloved parent, and who can tell how near she may have been? "For He shall give his angels charge over thee." "Are not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" For many hours before his death he lay perfectly still; but just before the end, with a lond voice, he twice exclaimed, "I am going home—I am going home."

"Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

Bad Reading.

Some sage has said, "I am a part of all I have met." This, like many other wise sayings, is not an absolute truth. It is not entirely true physically. It is only true in the sense in which it is used: That a man is influenced by his surroundings. The scenery one gazes upon, the moral and physical atmosphere, the carpet on the floor, the pictures on the wall, the books and papers on the table, the food one eats, the people one meets—all go to make up the physical, mental and moral character.

This being true, we may say, with double emphasis, "A man is what he reads."

The thoughts he gets from reading enter into his intellectual makeup and become a part of his very being. If the reading is pure and full of good thoughts, the man becomes full of high ideals and noble purposes. If the reading is bad, it molds him down to its own low standard. If it is vicious and criminal, and he feeds upon it and gives its thoughts and facts a place in his mind, it turns him out a criminal. This is why so many crimes among youth have been traced directly to the reading of stories of crime. The books they have read have literally molded them into criminals.

We instance a few cases:—

Some boys were arrested in Northern Ohio for waylaying a traveller and robbing him. As they belonged to fairly good families, the neighborhood was astonished. Why had they done it? An investigation brought out the fact that they had been reading stories of robbers, and had been especially attracted by one called "Red Hand, the Robber," and they had organized a "Red Hand band." What made them rob the man? The book did it.

At Vassalboro, Me., the Friends have a seminary. A few years ago their magnificent building was burned, and one boy who did not escape was burned to death. They moved the school into the Gymnasium building to continue their work till a new building could be erected. In a short time the gymnasium was burned. They felt sure both buildings had been set on fire, but could not find the culprit. They moved the school into the meeting-house and continued the work. This greatly displeased the guilty boy, as he had burned the buildings that he might get away from school. So when the school kept on, he ran away. That led to suspicion, detectives arrested him, and he confessed to the acts.

He had been reading stories of the great criminals, and had said to his room-mate that he "wanted to be a Jesse James." The book did it.

Three young men were hung at Chattanooga for murdering the railroad agent at Shellmound. The trial of the young men brought out the fact that one of them had bought "Jesse James, the Noted Outlaw." They had all read it and started out a la Jesse James.

One of them stated on the trial that they went to the railway station to rob the agent, but did not do it the first night, because they thought they could not do it without killing him, and they shrank from that. They went home and read more of the "Jesse James." They studied how Jesse James did such things. Then came back in a few nights later and shot the agent through the window, and then went through the window over his dying body and got a few dollars out of the cash drawer.

What caused the murder of the agent at Shellmound? The bad book did it. What caused the young men to be hung at Chattanooga? The same bad book did it.

Three young men at Danville, Ill., so young they were scarcely more than boys, read the lives of some of the great outlaws and criminals. A wise man has said, "Show me the books you read, and I'll tell you what you are." These boys became what they read. They read villainy, and became villains.

They undertook to rob a wealthy farmer, he resisted them, and they killed him to get his money. The Court, because of their youthfulness, sent them to the penitentiary instead of hanging them.

An Illinois town was greatly annoyed by burglaries. For a time they seemed to baffle the skill of officers. But the matter was put in the hands of experienced detectives, and the result was several High School boys were arrested. What in the world could have led those seemingly nice boys from nice homes into such an awful course? The answer is, bad books.

A passenger train was wrecked at Rome, N. Y., by some boys loosening the rails of the track. Fifteen deaths and sixty wounded. The youthful criminals, who had expected to rush in and rob passengers, were so frightened by the groans and the screams of the wounded that they ran away in terror. One of them lost his hat as he ran. This led to the detection. Why had they done it? It was traced directly to the books they had read.

And so we might go on with proof after proof that the reading gives bent to the mind. This is especially true with stories that are suggestive of lust. A young man or young woman who will read that class of literature, becomes impure in thought first; then as that continues, soon the stage of impure desires is reached.

Impure desires wait for the opportunity of gratification, which comes soon to one who looks for and desires it. Hence the third stage is reached, that of an impure life, and the feet are planted squarely in the broad road that leads down to death. When a young person violates the seventh commandment, the bottom drops out of his moral character and he seems to be unable to hold steadfastly to any moral principle, and seems to be more difficult to reform than though he had violated any other law. Have criminal stories wrecked hundreds? lustful stories have wrecked thousands.—American Railway Literary Union.

The Society of Friends—Their Influence and Worship.

Are the Friends dying out? This is a very old question; yet it is one ever new, and of far greater importance to society in general, especially in this country, than is supposed by the thoughtless observer of passing events. No student of history can fail to note the extraordinary influence exercised during more than two centuries by a comparatively small body, almost entirely composed in these later years at least of men and women exceptionally retiring and conservative, in no wise disposed to interfere with others, or to make any aggressive movement in behalf of the propagation of their faith. The contrast between the Quakers of the time of George Fox, when thousands languished in prison as the result of zealous adherence to principle and even fiery declaration of their faith in the face of scoffing enemies, and the extremely quiet, undemonstrative, and peaceful Friends of to-day, is marvellous. In the beginning they not only thrived upon persecution but seemed to court it, or at least they did not try to avoid it. The fires of spiritual feeling do not burn so fiercely, but they have not gone out by any means. Beneath the exterior of quietness, typified even in the garb usually assumed, may readily be found the vital spark of a living, strengthening and even joyous Christianity. There is the same reliance upon Divine power; the same calm, immovable faith; the same patient and confident waiting upon the spirit; and when it moves upon the troubled waters of the soul there is an outward manifestation of inward things that deeply touches and profoundly affects even the careless beholder. . . .

Yet there are thousands and tens of thousands of pure-minded, cultivated, and most industrious people who can resort to meeting-houses utterly devoid of all adornment, with no attractions for the wordly eye or ear, with nothing upon which to fix the attention except the calm faces of the elders as they sit so serenely, an example to young and old, ready either to speak or to listen, to openly testify, or to let the countenance alone reveal the working of the mind and heart. There is an utter absence of novelty. There is no looking forward, at stated intervals, for a new preacher. There is nothing approaching excitement. There is no strain of expectation. There is no division of sentiment apparent: full houses one time and the strange absence of many members of the Society at another. The very atmosphere seems to be under a peculiar spell. The visitor feels that he, too, no matter how difficult the task, must conform to the quiet and self-contained ways of those about him. The spirit of content settles down upon him unconsciously. He becomes amazed at his own receptiveness. He expected to soon get weary. He thought he would be bored to death. He never could stand it. He should want to cry out or run away. He was sure he would make an exhibition of himself. He would commit some act of indiscretion, or at least impoliteness. He would smile at such queer worship, if he did nothing more. But as the moments glide by imperceptibly, and the stranger looks into the sweet faces beneath the capacious bonnets on one side, and beholds the evidences of self-control and perfect peace which also mark the features of those about him on the men's side, he begins to relax, to forget himself, to be absorbed, to be thoroughly bereft of all desire to criticize or to scoff. He is moved in spite of himself. Every fibre of his being, physical, mental and spiritual, is undergoing a new and delightful experience. He never before knew what it was to rest as in the very hollow of the Almighty hand. His soul is stirred within him. He is in full communion with the spirits around him. He would readily shake hands with the worst enemy he has on earth. He cannot but realize that showers of blessings are descending into waiting hearts like the gentle dews of heaven. A glistening eye here and there, the gentle, noiseless moving of the handkerchief, tells its own story.

Now the stillness is broken for a few moments. The words of Holy Writ sound upon waiting ears. The text may or may not be a familiar quotation. It is only the beginning. The speaker is only reciting the song of the soul, as it has been wandering through green pastures and by still waters. A strange sort of sermon indeed. It passes like a dream, so full of gentleness, of the spirit of peace and good will. Not one unkind reflection; not even a suggestion of harshness; but the powerful drawing of a noble life, appealing sympathetically to men and women, all having a common desire, all seeking strength at the same fountain of eternal mercy and goodness and truth. Presently, on the other side, a bonnet is removed as its wearer softly drops upon her knees in supplication, while all others reverently rise and stand in silence. There is the outpouring of a heart full of love to God and man; an earnest, touching appeal for Divine aid, for light, for help, for guidance, for safety, for salvation. Such a prayer must be carried on angel wings beyond the battlements of Heaven to the land where there is no night, and where the book of remembrance is kept for those who do the will of Him, "Who so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Then, perhaps, there may be another brief word of testimony and exhortation, and all is still again. There arises, on the women's side, one whose gentle voice tremulously says "Let not your heart be troubled. Ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am ye may come also." And this is all! The surpassing pathos of it is in the fact that this is a bereaved mother, one who never before spoke in meeting, whose little one was suddenly taken a fortnight since! This is her testimony of the comfort which she has found in this time of darkness and grief. There is the faintest rustle on the back benches. An invalid has fainted. The old village doctor, sitting just across the aisle, tip toes around noiselessly. Timely relief, through the assistance of one of the women, is rendered, and a few moments the afflicted one has recove her composure. Meanwhile, there has not b the remotest sign of disturbance in any ot seat. What superb self-control! What measurable advantage is the training gi such people every hour of their quiet lives. their homes, in their meetings, in the so arena, in business circles, everywhere, it is same.

The Quakers dying out? May it never so! Such a brake upon society, especiall these restless days, cannot be dispensed w Their influence is felt far beyond the imm ate borders of every society. What infin benefit it would be to every man, woman child, not related in any way to Friends, to to Quaker meeting once in a while. Let overburdened, overwearied, brain-raked b ness man think of this. Let him turn as some Fourth or Fifth-day morning and step i the old meeting-house and just get quiet, even half a hour. He would come forth a man. Let him go to Quaker meeting on Fi day regularly, once a month, and he will longer and know a great deal more of s happiness, no matter whether he has religi views of any kind or not. Let the excit worn-out society woman go sit amongst gentle creatures in the Quaker meeting. will think she is in heaven. Let the wear mother in the humble homes of the commun go and be rested. Let the workman, wh every muscle is under tension, go and be freshed. Weary humanity everywhere is ing out for rest, rest! Yet there is no re not even one day in the week, for great nu bers in this land to-day. The Friends not o respect the Sabbath, but in their mode of w ship they teach all mankind how to unbuc the straps; how to relieve the strain; how rest. If they taught no other lesson, if th accomplished no other task, their contin existence would be a benediction in this wo of care and strife and toil.—Evening Telegra

An Incident in Thomas A. Edison's Earl History.

A good many years ago I was keeping White House at East Buffalo, New York. falo is a great railroad centre and at that t it was a great transfer point of live stock dead freight. At that time there was no s thing as a standard guage for railroad trac nearly every road had its own gauge, con quently when freight had to go over two more roads it had to be transferred. D freight was transferred by raising the bod the car by elevators from the trucks off of road onto another, but live stock was all ta off at Buffalo, watered and fed and then ship or unless sold at Buffalo, to remain there. now it is quite different, as they have a r lar standard gauge of tracks and live s cars. They can water and feed on the and can ship from Chicago, Kansas City, ha or any of those Western points to New Y Boston, or any Eastern point without tr ferring. Most of the Eastern buyers wer Buffalo at that time and bought their live s there; then they were entitled to a stock er's pass for every car load of live stock they shipped. As a rule the buyers did no on the train with their live stock, but shippers attend to their stock. One day e late fall, and it was cold weather, a eman who was a western live stock dealer into my hotel and said: "Mr. Mitchell, is a young man who wishes to get through ston; can you do anything for him? He o money and I have got him passed through stock drover's pass from Grosse Ile" (a fer point between the Michigan Central he Grand Trunk R. R.) The young man thinly and poorly clad, having on a long duster with a knit jacket or "hug me ," that some of the shippers had given a straw hat and badly worn shoes and hair, and altogether was rather a ludicrous ng piece of humanity. I said: "Young where did you come from, where do you to go to, and what do you want to do?" id he came from Grosse Ile; he had been tock reporter and telegraph operator there ie wanted to get to Boston, thinking there l be better opportunities for him there. I to my head clerk Joseph M. Cown, "When IcCurdy comes in (who was clerk in the fer office and boarded with me) ask him ere is any chance for a pass," and just as ere talking McCurdy came in. I said: e, what are the chances to get a pass for young man?" He said: "Mr. Mitchell, I get it for you, but I cannot get it for him." got the pass for the young man to New . He said he could get from there to on, and the young man got to Bos'on his long linen duster and his knit "hug ight" over his duster, with a straw hat nd badly worn shoes. He saw in the r a lightning operator was wanted, so he ed at the head office, and said: "I see you rtise for a lightning operator." The Sutendent said: "Do you think you can fill bill?" "Well," the young man said, "I illing to try." "Come in to-morrow at 'clock and we will give you a trial," thinko have a little fun with his ludicrous lookustomer. The next morning promptly at 'clock the young man was on hand. The rintendent said: "There is the paper," ing to a pile of paper, "and there is the ument." The young man instead of tak- few sheets of paper took the whole pile, own at the instrument and called up the York operator, who was such a rapid ator that the Boston people could not get ne that could receive fast enough, but the New Yorker had exhausted himself alled for the Superintendent and said: o have you got there?" The Superintensaid: "A 'buckwheat' from way back." ll," said he, "Keep him; he will do." And do you think this "buckwheat" was? No a person than the great wizard, Thomas dison.

course I thought no more about the young with the linen duster, until a few years I got the pass for him. I was keeping l in Bradford when a gentleman came to ford to lecture on electricity, and I had pleasure of listening to him. He gave e an interesting talk on Thomas A. Edison, when he described his appearance in Boson making his application for a position at graphing, I said: "There is the young man I got the stock drover's pass for to go igh to New York on a live stock train." is story sounds like a fairy tale, but it is nevertheless true.—B. C. Mitchell in the West Chester Daily News.

The New Strength.

A few years after the gospel had been successfully planted among the Muncy Delaware Indians, four Christian Indians had occasion to go to the village with a parcel of furs to trade for home comforts. On reaching the village, the trader, who was a white man, met them and offered them some fire-water, the trader knowing that these very Indians, on previous occasions, would drink fire-water. The Indians shook their heads and said, "No, we are Christians—will drink no more fire-water." The happy result was full pay for their furs, perhaps for the first time. The trader thought the Indians would drink when by themselves. He imagined the Indians were frightened, that the missionary might hear about it. When the Indians were about to return, the white man took a small cask and started ahead of the Indians, and placed his fire-water on the Indian trail at the edge of a sloping bank, and hid himself near by to see the results. Presently the four Indians came marching along in Indian file, and the leading one stopped suddenly, and exclaimed, "Aw, huh! Lo, the evil spirit," pointing his finger to the cask, and the second Indian, on coming up, shook the cask with his foot, and said, "Yes, I hear him." The third Indian, on coming up, stooped down and said, "Yes, I smell him." The fourth Indian, on coming up, gave the cask such a kick, and said, "Away with you," and the cask went tumbling down the sloping hill, to the surprise of the white man, who had to take up his fire-water and drink it himself, and the four Indians went on, like brave warriors, rejoicing. These Christian Indians had learned the omnipresence of God, the Great Spirit. They had learned that God can see them in the woods as well.

If, according to the law of the Hebrews, he who killed a man, though involuntarily, was obliged to fly for it; if God would not suffer David to build him a temple because he had been the occasion of so much bloodshed, though his wars were said to be just; if among the ancient Greeks it was a custom that they who had defiled their hands with human blood, though without any fault of theirs, had need of expiation,—what person living, and particularly if he be a Christian, does not see how unfortunate and ominous a thing war is, and with what endeavors we should strive to keep ourselves from it, though it were not unjust in its objects! And it is certain that among the Christian Greeks a canon was for a long while observed, by virtue of which whosoever killed his enemy, in what war soever, was excommunicated for the term of three years.—Hugo Grotius.

Notes from Others.

Paul's preaching made Felix tremble. To-day Felix is quite as likely to make the preacher tremble for fear he will be offended.—The Armory.

The Chester County Times says: "The pulpit of the First Baptist church at Phœnixville, Pa., became vacant about three months ago, and since the last pastor resigned eighty preachers from all parts of the United States have made application for the vacant pastorate. The church pays a salary of $1,000 a year, with a house."

The proverbs of savage races are generally pointed and pithy. The Basutos say, "The thief catches himself;" the Yorubus, "He who injures another injures himself;" the Wolofs, "Before healing others, heal yourself." In Acra they say, "Nobody is twice a fool;" among the Oji, "The moon does not grow full in a day;" "The poor man has no friends." A Pashto proverb says, "a feather does not stick without gum." Others are: "A crab does not bring forth a bird;" "A razor cannot shave itself;" "Cross the river before you abuse the crocodile;" "Perseverance always triumphs;" "The thread always follows the needle;" "Preparation is better than afterthought."

The Homiletic Review refers to a recent report of a conversation with an eminent statesman, now a justice of the Supreme bench at Washington, which represents him as saying:

"'You ministers are making a fatal mistake in not holding forth before men, as prominently as the previous generation did, the retributive justice of God. You are fallen into a sentimental style of rhapsodizing over the love of God, and you are not appealing to that fear of future punishment which your Lord and Master made such a prominent element in his preaching. And we are seeing the effects of it in the widespread demoralization of private virtue and corruption of the public conscience throughout the land.'"

Religion by Programme.—Of old, men spake "as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts ii: 4.) When the Lord's disciples came together, every one had a psalm, an instruction, a revelation, a tongue, an interpretation (1 Cor. xiv: 26). Then all might prophesy, or speak to edification, that all might learn and all be comforted (1 Cor. xiv: 31). But men have outgrown all that, and now things are cut and dried, and planned and programmed. . . Small wonder that Canadians who spend the Sabbath in some of the American cities report empty churches when they come home. The people are not all fools. They know their spiritual wants are not met by a Sunday concert.—The Safeguard.

Booker Washington, one of the foremost of his colored race, is urging them on to common sense efforts to rise in the world. Some of his remarks might apply to some white folks. He urges them, among other things, to raise chickens and quit stealing them. More hogs and cows, fewer dogs and cats. A home before a piano. Good plain clothes before finery. Plenty of good, wholesome victuals before so many "fancy fixings." More solid food and less frolicking. More reading and less gadding. More savings banks and fewer mortgages. More learning and less laziness. More vegetables and fruits, and less weeds and underbrush. More flowers on the market-stalls and fewer in their bonnets. He says, "Some of the hens are doing better than some of the men." One thing is sure everywhere among all people, that "some wives are doing better than some husbands.—Dr. Pepper.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The U. S. S. Resolute sailed from New York for Porto Rico on the 18th inst., with about 700 tons of supplies furnished by the Philadelphia and New York Relief Committees. The condition of Porto Rico is still deplorable. The report of Major John Van R. Hoff, Surgeon, U. S. A., President of the Board of Relief, dated Ninth Month 30th, shows that of a total population in seventy municipalities of 934,025, as many as 261,501 are indigent. During Ninth Month there were 607 deaths and 17,605 cases of sickness. The number of rations issued were 850,589. There were 25,332 men working for the relief sent to them. While conditions are still bad, they are nevertheless improving. A letter just received from General George W. Davis, Governor General of Porto Rico, Tenth Month 3rd, says that demands for relief are not increasing and that he has been able to stop the issue of supplies in the divisions of San Juan, Fajardo and Arroyo, and that they can soon be stopped in several other districts. Major Hoff's report shows that on Ninth Month 30th, in San Juan, there were only 1851 indigent in a population of 30,744; in Farjardo, 1200 indigent in a population of 9207, and in Arroyo, 2000 indigent in a population of 4332. The Merchants' Association of the 18th has alone forwarded relief valued at $100,000. It is recognized, of course, that this form of relief must necessarily be temporary. It cannot continue long without permanently pauperizing a large proportion of the population. It must be admitted that the change in the control of Porto Rico from Spain to the United States has, for the time being, made the condition of the people worse than it was under Spanish rule. This is generally a result of such a radical revolution. But when Porto Rico is made a territory of the United States, with a territorial Government and free trade, present conditions should change.

There are fifteen hundred submarine cables in the world, over which six million messages are sent every year. Eighteen lines cross the Atlantic Ocean; but the Pacific has never been crossed, for the reason that no one nation has ever owned or controlled a chain of landing-places across it, and lengths of cable over three thousand miles long are impracticable. The United States is now in a condition to lay such a cable, as it has landing-places at Hawaii, Wake Island, Guam, and the Philippines.

The agricultural laborers in the United States number over 2,500,000 and there are 5,000,000 farmers.

The largest unbroken area of grain in the world is now being harvested. It is in Madera and Fresno counties, California, and extends over 25,000 acres, or about forty square miles, an area nearly one-fourth that of Chicago.

The total value of the lumber annually manufactured in the Northwest, including Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota, is $80,000,000.

There are four large rabbit farms in Indiana. The largest one is located at Wabash, and covers sixty acres.

A firm of fish dealers in Mobile, Ala., is experimenting with a railroad tank car in which, if successful, it will transport Spanish mackerel, pompano, Gulf bluefish and other Southern fishes alive to Northern cities.

According to an engineer, an American firm is turning out a large quantity of paper tiles for roofing purposes. They are said to be hard and tough and the glazing somewhat resembles Japanese lacquer. They are said to be cheap, and can be made in any color or shape to suit the purpose.

The Cincinnati Enquirer says: "The publisher of a local trade paper has just received an inquiry from Smyrna, Turkey, for ready made frame houses or cottages of two stories, with veranda on the first floor, shingle roof, either painted or white, complete in every detail, excepting the window panes. They must have from three to five rooms, not counting the servants' quarters and range in price from $200 to $1000 and upward. They must be shipped 'knocked down.' From 1000 to 2000 houses a year will be ordered."

"When some time ago American competition in iron and steel was talked of in German papers many of the technical and trade journals made light of it," says Hanauer, the American Vice Consul General at Frankfort, in a report to the State Department. "Quite different, however, is the expert opinion of the Chamber of Commerce of Bochum, which comprises the leading iron and steel manufacturers of this district. In its last annual report this body speaks as follows: 'American competition, which in 1897 arose in the continental markets, has made further progress during 1898. Pig iron exported to Germany has increased 16 per cent., as compared with the imports of the year previous, fine cast iron and wrought iron 28 per cent., and common ironware 75 per cent., while the import of bicycles and parts gained 106 per cent. The value of these American articles imported into Germany in 1897 amounted to $2,380,000; in 1898 to $3,570,000. This extraordinary increase in so short a time gives cause for very serious concern, especially when it is considered that the demand in the United States has advanced enormously, so that no large stocks were available for foreign export. Consequently, we have to reckon with certainty that the import of American iron and steel will continue to increase; to prevent it will require strenuous exertions on the part of German works.'"

Slag left after the making of steel by the Bessemer process is now being converted into phosphate.

During the year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1898, the army of railroad employees had 1,958 men killed and 31,761 wounded. This army consisted of 874,554 men. One employee out of every 446 was killed, and one out of every 27 was injured. Considering the fact that many of the employees are not exposed to special danger, this is a frightful record. Many of the important battles of the world show no more serious loss than that. It is also noted that though the number of automatic couplers in use was much larger in 1898 than in 1897, the accidents of the latter year exceeded those of the former. This is partly accounted for by the fact there were more employees and a larger business. The number of passengers killed was only one in every 2,222,126. These figures show what a dangerous calling is that of train hands, and emphasize the necessity of providing by law for the adoption of the latest and best devices for lessening the number of accidents.

Thirty-one new cases of yellow fever and three deaths have been reported at Key West since Tenth Month 9th. Thirteen new cases and two deaths were reported on the 23d instant.

There were 384 deaths in this city last week, which is 2 more than the previous week and 5 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 212 were males and 172 females: 43 died of heart diseases; 42 of consumption; 33 of pneumonia; 18 of apoplexy; 16 of nephritis; 16 of cancer; 13 of debility; 12 of diphtheria; 12 from casualties; 11 of marasmus; 10 of inanition; 10 of convulsions; 9 of inflammation of the brain; 9 of Bright's disease, and 9 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

FOREIGN.—The Queen has called out the whole military reserve, and an estimate of war expenses in South Africa reaches $153,000,000.

On the 20th instant the forces of the South African Republic and Orange Free State attacked the British in Natal colony, commanded by General White, and were repulsed. The battle lasted eight hours, and the British loss, as officially reported, was 11 officers and 31 men killed, including General Symons, mortally wounded, and 21 officers and 151 men wounded. The Boer losses were very heavy. Advices from Mafeking reiterate the story of a Boer repulse there, with severe losses. Vryburg has surrendered to the Boers. A new element in the military situation is the rising of the warlike tribe of Basutos, under Chief Mchoko, against the Orange Free State.

The London authorities have decided upon the novel municipal step of devoting £10,000 to the erection of a building to shelter families whose houses are in progress of disinfection after outbreaks of infectious disease.

The total value of sea fish landed in Irgland in 1898 was $1,962,935, an increase of over $70,000 on the previous year.

There are 1640 co-operative societies in Great Britain, with more than 1,500,000 members, doing a business of $325,000,000 a year.

Cheap toys of persons in Germany live literally "on straw," making it up into blankets, panniers, boxes, knickknacks, hats, bonnets, etc. Professional schools have even been founded, where the trade is taught in all its varieties.

The only man in the world reported to be worth over $1,000,000,000 is the Anglicized German, Alfred Beit. He is not yet fifty, is well educated, and made his fortune in diamonds during the past twenty-four years.

The Malay language is spoken by more than 40,000,000 persons. It is said to be easy to learn, as it has almost no grammar.

India had 22,491 miles of railroad in operation Third Month 31, and 3,568 miles under construction. The net earnings for 1898 showed an increase of $4,210,804 over the previous year. There was an increase of 1,320,505 passengers and 2,652,283 tons of freight in a country where England took up the white man's burden only a generation or two ago.

It is believed that the most ancient dictionary in the world is the Chinese lexicon, compiled by Pacutshe a thousand years before Christ.

Melbourne has recently had its first taste of a snow storm, and to the great majority of the citizens it was as much of a novelty as an earthquake. The fall was particularly heavy, but young Melbourne found enough snow on the ground to enable it to enter with thusiasm into the novel sport of snow-balling.

"Extensive and commercially available" coal beds have been discovered in the State of Pueblo, Mexico.

Advices from Caracas show that the President of Venezuela fled to Laguayra on the 20th instant, with men, leaving the way open for the peaceful entry the capital of the insurgent leader, General Castro. President Andrade, it is understood, has not resigned, but go abroad. General Castro, the successful Venezuelan revolutionist, has entered Caracas and been welcomed the people, who are said to be desirous for peace.

A despatch from Lima, Peru, says that the Government by strategic movement of troops is trying to surround Durand, the head of the revolution. In the meantime bodies of revolutionists are surrendering under Government guarantees.

The export of nitrate from Chile this year will exceed 30,000,000 quintals. A quintal is a hundred-weight.

The following letter shows the spirit in which of the applications for help for the Russ-exiles are received. This was written by nevolent Episcopalian clergyman:

hank thee very much for the opportunity thee ffords me of making a small contribution towards uffering exiles. I enclose my check for twenty-ollars.

y I thank thee, because it may interest thee to that a few minutes before thy letter was brought I was earnestly wishing that I might be able to some one happier before the close of the day, out ense of the gratitude I was feeling for a blessing received from our loving Father's hand, and thy gave me the oppor unity.

The Passing of Friendly Intercourse.

A New England correspondent regrets the transferring of a Meeting on Ministry and Oversight from the day before the Quarterly Meeting to the morning of the Quarterly Meeting itself. This arrangement is for the sake of allowing attenders of both meetings to go and come by railway train on the same day. The regret expressed was for the loss of "the social part, the mingling together which we enjoyed as we went with our parents to the homes. This meant a great deal, and was a privilege this generation cannot realize. It kept our meetings on a higher plane than the conferences of other churches to which we are coming."

The modern curtailment of time for attending our Monthly and Quarterly Meetings is accompanied by a lessening of interest in membership and of the virtue of hospitality. The former practice of parents of taking children with them in their carriages on a day's or a half-day's drive to Monthly or Quarterly Meetings, lodging one or two nights at a Friend's house, enlarging our social acquaintance in various neighborhoods of Friends, broadening and deepening our interest in the whole Society and mankind in general, opening up ways of our reciprocating hospitalities when our turn should come for entertaining Friends, was something of a liberal education in itself. But when there was added to this intercourse and enlarging of heart and mind, an attendance upon the solemnities and business of the Church which brought us together, an interest in the affairs of Truth was slowly but surely built up in the youthful mind, and a regular habit of attending our meetings for Discipline confirmed, which, in mature life, we would not, if we could, depart from. So a succession of those who love the right order of the affairs of our goodly heritage was trained for the service of their day. It is now growing harder and harder to find such a succession from the ranks of those who have not been brought up to join their parents in the attendance of all their Meetings for Discipline. We know of none who did not accompany their parents on these Monthly and Quarterly Meeting excursions from home who have turned out to be helpers, to say nothing of members, of our religious Society. But the privileges of extended intercourse of neighborhood with neighborhood in mutual visiting on account of these meetings was one of the most winning inducements to our early interest in Friends and what they stood for, and a gracious preparation for that deeper interest which, later on, needs not such entertainment.

Where are the helpers to conduct the affairs of our Meetings for Discipline to come from, except from among the attenders of those meetings? And who are likely to be the attenders, except such as are habituated to it from their youth? Our schools seem to bind our children away from Meetings for Discipline and to be raising up a generation unacquainted with them, and likely to be as absent during business life as we have trained them to be during school life. The present writer now thanks his parents for taking their children out of school to attend, during the proper hours, our mid-week Meetings for Worship and Discipline. The places of the schoolmates who laughed at them for this have long since been unknown in our religious Society.

A departure from former simplicity, and an entering upon the slavery to modern standards of living, seem to keep the faces of heads of families too close to the grindstone of daily toil, or to place the control of their time too much in employers' hands, to maintain their ancient liberties and privileges incident to well-rounded membership. And the multiplication of modern conveniences for hospitality seems to leave all the less room for hospitality itself. So that a Society with the spirit of society, or of being "members one of another," starved out by the world, would have only to blame every beginning of leaving its first love, who has so clearly proscribed his remedy in these words, "If ye walk in the light as He is in the light, ye have fellowship one with another."

A SLANDER MET.—On the same day that an unjust statement appeared in a Philadelphia paper, imputing a barbarity to the Doukhobors in compelling (as was alleged) their women to drag plows like oxen, or side by side with oxen, etc., we were glad to see the following undesigned refutation in a copy of the Picton Gazette, of Canada.

"The anxiety of these patient and long-suffering people—who for years have been deprived of the commonest necessities of life—to obtain for themselves new homes, is everywhere in evidence. Take the case of breaking the soil. The able-bodied men were called upon to hire out as laborers and railroad navvies, leaving only women, children and aged and crippled men in the villages. Under these circumstances what did these noble women do? Sit down and wait for the return of their fathers, brothers and husbands? Not they! They decided that it was their duty to tide over the crisis that confronted them. They knew the land should be broken for next year. They had no spades, horses or oxen, nor the wherewithal to purchase such. What then should be done? The question was a grave one. Winter was approaching, and what was to be done must be done quickly, or it would be too late. This is what was eventually decided upon: Twenty-four robust young women fastened around their persons long flour sacks, the ends of which were attached to crossbars fastened to long ropes reaching the plow, which was guided by one of the few men left in the village. These twenty-four young women walked in two rows and drew the plow for two hours, when they were relieved by another batch of twenty-four. These in turn worked the same time, and were then relieved. They rather seemed to enjoy the novelty of the work, and usually returned from their labors singing, happy in the consciousness of helping to make independent homes for themselves in this free country. It was noticed that an older woman always accompanied the girls, and watched that none worked if not fully able to take part. Working in this way, considerable ground was prepared for next year's crops, that otherwise would have remained unbroken."

Doukhobor Notes.

BY WM. EVANS.

The public meeting, called for the fifth of Tenth Month, was attended by many interested Friends, and much warm sympathy was developed upon learning of the prospective hardships for the Exiles, during the coming ten months. The Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings were encouraged to select sub-committees throughout the Yearly Meeting, which has since been done. A circular has been printed for distribution to all families of Friends. Contributions, the flow of which had abated during the summer months, have recommenced, and over $6000 have been received by the Treasurer since the meeting. Besides cash contributions, a car load (21 tons), of blankets, yarn, medicines, clothing, soap, hardware, flour, meal and groceries was collected, and forwarded to Winnipeg, Tenth Month, 26th. The contents of the car had been carefully assorted, and put up in 751 packages, each package being marked to denote the articles within, thus saving an over-hauling and division at the other end of the route.

The next day after the meeting, a telegram was forwarded to Commissioner McCreary, at Winnipeg, authorizing him to purchase and distribute a carload each of potatoes and onions; and on the seventeenth he was requested to expend one thousand dollars additional, for potatoes. This vegetable can be had at twenty-five cents per bushel near the railroads of Assiniboia, and it is very desirable, not only to furnish the villagers with this kind of food for the winter, but to have a large supply stored in caves, so as to be ready for planting, as early as the ground will admit of it, in the Spring.

In the Ninth Month last, Peter and Cornelius Jansen, Russian Mennonites, now residing in Nebraska, kindly consented to go to Canada, inspect the situation of the Doukhobors, and purchase and distribute what seemed most needed. They expended $3500 in procuring forty-nine cows, ten yoke of oxen, six wagons and harness, one horse, some medicine, and a quantity of linseed oil, which the Russians had been accustomed to use as food, taking the place of lard or fat, which they never eat, nor indeed any kind of flesh food; and their systems showed the desirability of a change of diet from the daily routine of bread and tea, and a soup made from herbs. Here it may not be amiss to insert a letter sent to the committee from some women who had received one of the cows purchased by Cornelius Jansen:

"Beloved Brothers and Sisters in the Lord Jesus Christ!

"All wishing to fulfil God's commandments included in two commandments given by the Saviour, Christ Jesus, we inform you dear brothers and sisters, that thanks to your great kindness we have just received a cow among those sent to all our brothers and sisters. Although all received it with profound gratitude towards the Lord, and with thanks to the kind people for their precious gift, yet none more gratefully than we, women bereft of our husbands. Separated from them for years, we have been left with young children at the mercy of the world and of kind people, whilst our husbands—some of whom have laid down their lives for the Lord's sake and His glory,—are in a far distant land, in Siberia. Therefore, dear brothers and sisters, dear, indeed dear, is your charity to us, in time of trouble. The cow we have received from you will feed our little ones for several months.

"We are unable to express all our gratitude on paper, but feelings of love take possession of our hearts. We feel deeply grateful in our souls, and offer thanks in our prayers to our Lord God and to the kind people whose feelings of love cause them to have sympathy with their fellow beings, brothers and sisters.

"May God, our Heavenly Father, have mercy on you on the Day of Judgment, and may He reward you a hundred-fold with His unchangeable joy.

"We are very thankful to the Lord, and also to the kind people, who will certainly not allow us to die of starvation.

"Good bye, dear brothers and sisters; may you have good health and prosperity.

Your loving sisters,

ANNA SIMEONOVA,

[and seven others, omitted for brevity.] With all our children and all our sisters and brothers of the Spiritual Christian Community of the Universal Brotherhood: Village Prolerpeovshe."

Cornelius Jansen, under date of Ninth Month, 12th, writing from Yorkton, Assiniboia, informed that a car-load of cows which he had purchased from Mennonites in Gretna, Manitoba, arrived at Yorkton, Ninth Month, 9th—"T next day, the Lord's Day, was of course spe quietly, but yesterday it was my privilege distribute the oxen and allot the cows; al the harness and wagons. It was truly touc ing to see and feel the gratitude of the me How I did wish that you could have been pr sent!" Further on in the same letter he say "The people have no fat of any kind, as y well know; and the milk which they now hav or soon will have, is consumed at once; butter-making is out of the question; now, know they would be happy if they could g raw linseed oil, say a ten gallon keg to ea village, to take the place of butter or lar they have it in Russia, with their food, eve day. They virtually live on dry bread and te with once in a while some watery soup; at lea this is what I ate while with them; now if son rice, perhaps one or two bags, could go alo with the linseed oil, they could have son variety, and they would not get into such anaemic condition, in which some now witho doubt are."

One of the best gifts which could be bestow on the exiles is a large quantity of wool, wi wheels to convert it into yarn. They are adep in spinning, and in the long winter evenings 50° north latitude they could prepare this m terial for warm stockings, mittens and clot ing, while others could knit. Perhaps fi hundred spinning-wheels could be utilized advantage.

Samuel Rogers, of Toronto, we learn throu C. Jansen, has agreed to furnish 2,000 pou of wool, which can be bought in Manitoba eight cents per pound.

Other needs are leather, for they can ma their own shoes and boots; or, if raw hides supplied, they can tan them; also sheepskins coats, to meet a temperature of some sixty grees below zero. They are also poorly su plied with lamps and with petroleum to burn them.

The brighter side of their lot is seen in recent communication from the Commission of Immigration, who states that 320 men fr the North Colony, on Swan River, are worki on a new railroad, within twenty miles of th home, and earning over a dollar each per d It would seem unlikely, however, that cro ties and rails could be laid when the severi of winter was upon them. Tent-life is n abolished, and the log-houses are almost co pleted, but are mostly without sash. The appears to be yet enough firewood availab but as 7,000 people must consume much fu there would seem to be a need for systems planting of groves for the years to come.

The malarial fever, contracted by the thousand who left Cyprus, still lingers amo them, but is much lessened.

Since his return to Nebraska, C. Jans writes that, while in Assiniboia, he had tak the opportunity to converse with many farms some, in particular, who had been resident th from five to fifteen years, and that from all could see and learn, he felt "confident that Doukhobors will not only be able to make living, and have already not only an auspici start, but are also very favorably placed, compared with many other settlers."

BETTER freedom in bonds, than bonds freedom.

General State of the Church.

The Church of God is to-day courting the rld. Its members are trying to bring it vn to the level of the ungodly. The ball, theatre, nude and lewd art, social luxuries, h all their loose moralities, are making inds into the sacred enclosure of the church, as a satisfaction for all this worldliness, istians are making a great deal of Lent and ter and Good Friday, and church ornamentaas. It is the old trick of Satan. The Jewish rch struck on that rock, the Romanish church wrecked on the same, and the Protestant rch is fast reaching the same doom.

Our great dangers, as we see them, are asllation to the world, neglect of the poor, stitution of the form for the fact of godli, abandonment of discipline, a hireling state ministry, an impure gospel, which summed is a fashionable church. That Methodists uld be liable to such an outcome, and that re should be signs of it in a hundred years n the "sail loft," seems almost the miracle istory; but who that looks about him tocan fail to see the fact?

o not Methodists, in violation of God's word their own discipline, dress as extravagantly as fashionably as any other class? Do not ladies, and often the wives and daughters ne ministry put on "gold and pearls and ly array?" Would not the plain dress ined upon by John Wesley, Bishop Ashbury, worn by Hester Ann Rogers, Lady Huntingand many other equally distinguished, be regarded in Methodist circles as fanati-? Can any one going into a Methodist rch in any of our chief cities distinguish attire of the communicants from that of theatre and ball goers?

not worldliness seen in the music? Elably dressed and ornamented choirs, who any cases make no profession of religion are often sneering skeptics, go through a artistic, or operatic performance which is uch in harmony with spiritual worship as pera or theatre. Under such wordly perances spirituality is frozen to death.

Worldly socials, fairs, festivals, concerts, and like, have taken the place of the religious erings, revival meetings, class and prayer tings of earlier days.

ow true that the Methodist discipline is a letter. Its rules forbid the wearing of , or pearls, or costly array; yet not one thinks of disciplining its members for vio g them. They forbid the reading of such s and the taking of such diversions as do minister to godliness, yet the church itself to shows, and frolics, and festivals, and , which destroy the spiritual life of the g as well as the old. The extent to which is now carried on is appalling. The spiritdeath it carries in its train will only be vn when the millions it has swept into hell d before the judgment.

ne early Methodist ministers went forth to ifice and suffer for Christ. They sought places of ease and affluence, but of privaand suffering. They gloried not in their salaries, fine parsonages and refined congations, but in the souls that had been won Jesus. Oh, how changed! A hireling min will be a feeble, a timid, a truckling, a serving ministry without faith, endurance holy power.—R. S. Foster.

Religious Opinions of the Muncy Delawares, or Lenne Lenape Indians in Their Original State.

The Muncy Delawares universally believed in the existence of one Supreme Being, the Creator of all things and nations, whom they call "Kih-geh-aleh-munittoo," which means the Great and Mighty Spirit, and believing him to abound in love and mercy towards his creatures. They also believe in the existence of "Maytzeet Munittoo," meaning an Evil Spirit. The Indians imagine the Evil One has a great power over the creatures of the earth to injure any who may offend him. They also imagined that the Great Spirit was the most powerful of the two. In fact, when a war was declared between two tribes, they would admonish each other to harken to the Good Spirit, not to the evil, the former always declaring peace. The word "Munittoo" simply means spirit, either good or bad. In order to designate the character or nature of the spirit they use the prefixes "Kih-geh-aleh" and "Maytzeet." Besides these two great leading spirits, the Indians believed in other minor spirits, each having a certain control over a portion of the great creation.

Their religious sacrifices and feasts are kept regularly at stated times of the year. They hold annual sacrifices, in which all take part. The first they call "The feast of first fruits," which they consider was praise to the spirit that watches over all manner of fruit under the sun. The second is called the "Evening festival," in which no bone of the deer is broken, and whatever remains at the break of day is burned before the rising of the sun. The chiefs and the medicine men also make an offering to the Great Spirit every sixth sun for the cleansing of themselves. The last of their annual sacrifices is considered to be very ancient and the most sacred, which lasts for twelve nights, with very little intermission. I will describe it as held by the Muncy Delaware Indians, comparatively speaking, only a few years ago.

Each family brings a few things raised by them from the "mother earth"—such as Indian corn or maize, potatoes, beans, squashes and maple sugar, also various kinds of fruit preserves—to an aged chief, who is appointed to receive such, and deposit the same in the house of sacrifice. The head chiefs of the different branches of the nation would consult each other in council as to all arrangements necessary for this great sacrificial feast. The Muncy Indians always had "Quich-tah-caun," the Big House. Some other tribes call theirs "the Long House." In this temple a fire-place was made at each end, and in the centre a large post is planted, beautifully carved. The skin of a deer is wound around the post during the ceremonies, with the antlers on. When the time arrives for the performances the leading chiefs would appoint a large number of young men, and send them into the woods in search of fifty deer for the offering. While the young hunters are out on the chase, all the Indian women which are considered as clean are engaged in gathering firewood intended to last for twelve nights. When the hunters have succeeded in killing the requisite number of deer for the sacrifice, they carry their booty home. On reaching the village twelve shots are fired in succession, and a pause is observed for a moment, then a volley by the whole band. Then they march in silence to the Big House, and are met by the big chiefs, and all the deer are deposited in the temple. When all arrangements are completed, then an old man, who is recognized as the master of all the ceremonies, would enter from the east door, and inviting the people to follow and when the "Quich-tah-caun" was full the doors closed. Then the four young men who take charge of the fires throw small quantities of hemlock boughs into the fires, which causes a dense smoke to rise. The four young men carry fans in their hands, and they fan the scented smoke all over the room and over the people. All, in silence, are in meditation for a few moments. Then the doors and other openings are thrown open. Then the old man, the master of the ceremonies, publicly declares to all the Indians that the "Big House," or the house of sacrifice, is being purified by the Great Spirit, and is in a proper condition to hold their great annual sacrifice. The Indian women would then be busily engaged in putting up tents around the Big House or "Quich-tah-caun," for the accommodation of Indians who come from long distances. The Indians believe that, after the purification of the Big House, it is then most sacred. No improper conduct is allowed within the ground, but the utmost solemnity prevails. Severe punishment is inflicted on man and beast that trespass on the grounds. No intoxicated person is allowed to enter the grounds, nothing unclean allowed to come near. An old man, who is generally looked upon as the master of all ceremonies, otherwise might be called a priest, for such a one always holds an honorable position, and is greatly respected by the tribes for his wisdom and goodness. He first enters the Big House, followed by all the chiefs and medicine men, and all sit in a circle, leaving a small space in the centre for the Indian singers. The first thing they do is to give every one present a mouthful of wine made from the juice of berries. After supplying all, the Indian singers are placed in the centre, around the carved post, with tortoise shells and small drums in their hands, with which they keep time while they are singing. Then the old man, the master of ceremonies, begins by delivering a short address, telling the people the object of their gathering together was to thank the Great Spirit for the growth of corn, and for the ripening of berries, and for the good luck in hunting, and for the blessings of good health, etc. At the end of his address he begins to walk around the room slowly, singing, and in his hand he holds a tortoise shell with a few pebbles in it, keeping time. His song consists in relating some great deeds he had done for the tribe, and reciting some of the dreams and visions he had while fasting in his childhood days. Some of these men recite wonderful stories in their songs of what happened to them while fasting, sometimes so solemn as to bring tears into the eyes of the listeners, and at the end of the old man's recitation he begins to dance, and the singers that are seated in the centre sing for the dreamer. One after another joins, and by the time he goes around once all are on a move. On reaching his seat he stops and hands the magic tortoise shell to the next in rank, he also begins by speaking and making recitations the same as the first, excepting the tune of his address and song, and the speaker and dancer ends the same as the first. This performance is followed night after night for twelve nights, and at midnight a short intermission takes place by a general shaking of hands, and the venison and other eatables are distributed among them. When all had been refreshed, they began, as usual, till morning, and at sunrise they disperse to the tents, and rest for the day. This annual sacrificial feast is considered by all as a very ancient institution, handed down from one generation to another. The Indians actually believe that, it were even once omitted, the Great Spirit would be displeased with his Indian children, and send sickness and death among them. Therefore the Muncy Indians were very punctual in their way of worshipping the Great Spirit.

What a Baby Did.

What can touch a mother's heart like the innocence of childhood? Rarely is a woman's soul too stained with evil, or her life too narrowed and embittered to withstand the message of love which comes to her in the innocence of childhood.

A traveller who has just returned from one of the most horrible prisons in Russia gives a striking illustration of this fact. A colonel was appointed to take charge of one of the largest and most noxious of the prisons. It was situated in the centre of an important province, and was filled with turbulent men and abandoned women. Harsh discipline, poor food, insufficient ventilation, uncleanliness, and hopelessness all conspired to brutalize the inmates.

Especially was this true of the women. The longer they were imprisoned the more depraved and unmanageable they became, until it needed a disciplinarian of the severest type to keep them under control. The colonel could manage the men, but the women defied him, and he began to think that he must resort to flogging to subdue them.

One morning the colonel's young wife took a walk in the prison-yard. She was a gentle enthusiast, who had made up her mind, when her husband first entered upon his official duties, to reform, if possible, the women prisoners by kindness. This purpose she failed to accomplish; for kindness seemed to have no more influence over them than solitary confinement. As she walked in the yard one morning she became apprehensive lest some harm might be done her baby, whom the nurse carried beside her, and for the first time had been taken into the enclosure.

As soon as the women prisoners caught sight of the child, they ran to it, gesticulating wildly. The mother gave a shriek and stood at bay before them, prepared to defend her baby from violence. The guard came running up. But instead of the abusive language which had heretofore greeted the young wife, the poor women broke into raptures over the dear little babe.

"Oh, the darling! Let me hold him!" One after another stretched out her marred arms in entreaty toward the obdurate nurse.

"Isn't he a dear?" exclaimed the vilest of the prisoners. At that word several of them peered into the pure face of the child, and broke down, tears streaming down their cheeks.

Begging to hold the baby, the laughing, crying, gesticulating women crowded around the child. The eternal motherhood lighted up their embruted faces, and the sight of unimpeachable innocence softened every stony heart.

Then the colonel's wife had a happy thought: "The best conducted woman of you all at the end of the week will be allowed to attend the baby for half an hour."

The women, whom neither kindness nor punishment had been able to restrain, became docile to every word and order. At the end of the week it became almost impossible to decide which one had earned the coveted reward. The baby made weekly visits to the prison-yard, and the gentle, humanizing effect upon the women seemed almost miraculous. Innocence is irresistible.—Selected.

Samuel Capper's Visit.

We left Tralee for Listowel early on Third-day morning, the seventh of Sixth Month, rather oppressed in spirit; and as we were informed that the people of Listowel were much worse than those of Tralee, we hardly knew what kind of reception to expect. On entering the town, we almost immediately met two priests, walking separately about and talking to the people. After taking up our quarters at Adam's hotel, we sent Joseph Newsom to find Maurice McNamarra O'Conor, with whom he, Edward Fitt and the Alexanders had some acquaintance, but he was a mile or two distant in the country at his farm. Joseph Newsom took a horse and went to seek him there. As he is a Romanist we could not entertain a very sanguine expectation of his assistance, but as we thought it best to use diligent endeavors to obtain a meeting with the people, William Alexander and Robert Charlton went, in the meantime, to see whether any other place or room could be procured for our purpose, in case the application to O'Conor failed. They did not succeed, as a school-room, the only suitable place, was refused; the national church party, as the schoolmaster informed us, having determined to keep out dissent; adding, that so deeply did he feel the importance of this that he must conscientiously do all he could to prevent our succeeding in getting a meeting. About two o'clock Joseph Newsom returned to us, saying that Maurice O'Conor would lend us the yard, and provide us with deals for seats, supports for them, labor and everything requisite; that he esteemed it a privilege to assist in the preparations for a Friends' meeting. In a few minutes afterwards M. O'Conor came and repeated his assurances of assistance; he also informed us that there was a conference of priests that day in the town, consisting of twenty-seven, that four of them were his guests, and actually then at his house, close by the yard in which we are to hold the meeting; this however, appeared to have little effect on him, for he was present most of the time the tent was raising and seating and rendered the most effective service.

A large number of persons visited the tent during its erection and preparation and openly talked of the penance they would have to undergo for attending the meeting. Some remarked to others: "We will have to walk twenty miles to get a ticket of absolution for being there," to which another replied, "Well, sure it is very fine weather and we have little to do; we will all go together." An hour or more before the time of the meeting, the parish priest, Mahony, came into the yard, and ul mately into the tents (he is a black, disgusti looking man), with a knotted horsewhip in h hand, and when the people drew towards hi bowing and touching their hats, he gave the his positive orders not to attend, and inde most of them left for a time; he afterwar sent a messenger to inform "the gentlem that he should not allow any of his people be present."

M. O'Conor seemed a little abashed at the proceedings of the priests, but he did not lea the tent. At seven o'clock, when I went ov I found M. O'Conor, the principal surgeon the place, who is a Protestant, the before me tioned school-master and a few other Prote ants; in all we had about twenty Protestan and fifty Romanists, and the meeting was quiet, solemn, and I believe reaching time many. M. O'Conor and some others seemed be absolutely absorbed in attention; there w a large concourse of people outside the ya many of whom, I apprehend, could hear; th were mostly quiet. After the meeting O'Conor informed some of the Friends that would be with us in a quarter of an hour twenty minutes, as he thought the priests w were at his house, would very soon be maki themselves comfortable; in a very short tim he came and spent the evening with us. was very free, giving us much informati which was interesting, and expressed his lief, that the total abstinence movement wo certainly lead to more charitable views of thin amongst the people, and that the difficul of getting at the people would be much l sened, as their sober habits were now leadi them to become readers and to their obtainin much more information and must continue do so. He wished the clergy, meaning t Roman priests, had attended themselves at t meeting; he could not see to what they cou have objected; he was asked how he wou settle the matter with his parish priest. "O he said, "I must laugh and talk him out of we are very good friends." He seemed think he should be able to bring a precede when on one occasion the Romish bishop Limerick or Galway, with some of his clerg were present at an opportunity when Elizabe Fry both preached and prayed.

On the eighth instant several of us return to Limerick, about fifty English miles. It w a very warm day, and the party I was wi were somewhat fatigued. We passed throu Tarbert and Askeaten, and had some m beautiful views of the Shannon. At Askeat it was with difficulty we could get anything eat; the innkeepers, although they knew W liam Alexander and Joseph Newsom, seem perfectly alarmed at seeing us, and the wh town appeared to be alarmed or excited w apprehension.

On Fifth-day, the ninth of Sixth Month attended the week-day meeting at Limeri and went the same evening to Cahir with Jam Alexander and Thomas Fitt. The youth's me ing for the county Tipperary was held th the next day. I was impressed with the be that our being there was, in the ordering best Wisdom; it was a searching time. H at the house of Jane Fennell I met my friend, D. Malcomsom. He is become very firm and seventy-seven years of age.

The twelfth of Sixth Month I was at meetings for worship at Clonmel; the ning was a deeply exercising time, in which se who are departed and departing from government of the Spirit were admonished, in the evening some ability was administ- d to pray for the release of the seed of the gdom held in bondage and oppressed in y hearts. At the conference after meeting he subject of public meetings, some Friends e appointed to assist in those intended to eld at Tipperary, Clogheen, Cahir, Thurler, plemore, etc.

War and Peace Notes.

UBAN ORPHANS.—The National Red Cross ety, Washington, D. C., makes a strong ap- for help for the reconcentrado Cuban or- ns. "About fifty thousand of these are tered through the cities and towns. They not children of low origin, but of the best ner families, their parents having died or n killed. Many of the mothers starved nselves to death in order to save their dren. These children, from thirty to a hun- l in each town, are utterly homeless. They principally by begging of the passengers every passing train, sometimes crowding n the trains in such numbers that passen- can scarcely get out. They are in rags filthy beyond description. Their limbs are ciated, their feet swollen and often broken n. The plan of the Red Cross is to make ll, plain and simple asylums for them where are, and in these to care for them, teach n to work, read, and to forget the lives of t and woe through which they have passed. ry asylum has from one to ten acres of nd adjoining it. The children are gentle obedient, and respond readily in all ways he efforts made to help them. It is only reconcentrado orphans that the Red Cross ying to help. With proper funds, which at to be given quickly and generously, it not be many months before the whole fifty sand can be saved and started on the way elf help."

is indeed humiliating that the "two great lish-speaking nations," the two who brought r out of chaos at the Hague Conference, secured the great Arbitration agreement, ld the same year have their hands imbrued lood, in disputes arising from their own ressions. We know that great numbers of good men and women of England will feel progress of such a conflict in South Africa personal weight of suffering—as we do shocking war in the islands of the Pacific. Intelligencer.

ORTO RICO DISASTER. — The destruction sed by the recent storm in Porto Rico has ght into striking contrast the limp and uid interest taken by the people in a work eal Christian benevolence, made necessary great natural disaster, and the passionate, ntrollable prodigality of the government the people's representatives, and even the le themselves, in the destructive ways of The great storm which visited Porto destroyed many lives and swept away the erty of nearly one-fourth of the inhabitants. a government representative lifts his voice avor of direct government aid in this hour of overwhelming distress. The whole task is left to private benevolence, though it is well known that while this is being organized many must suffer and die. If it were a question of war, in the name of "humanity" or of the national "sovereignty," there would be no hesitation in spending fifty, or a hundred, or five hundred million dollars, and in entering upon a course which would involve a perpetual drain of millions every month in the future. One's heart grows sick when he thinks how little the expenditure of the nation's funds is governed by the principles of real humanity. In the matter of private benevolence, how much better is it? The private response to Porto Rico's cry of distress is said to have been generous. It has been with many individuals. But the sum raised has reached barely twenty-five thousand dollars in any one of our great cities. In contrast to this, San Francisco has raised sixty thousand dollars for a great demonstration over the soldiers returned from the Philippines; partly, we are informed, to induce the soldiers to re-enlist. New York City has raised several hundred thousand dollars for a great Dewey demonstration when the Admiral came home. Every dollar of this money spent in these ways in these and other cities is worse than wasted. It all tends to infatuate people with the glory of war, to teach a false patriotism, to lead the nation away into warlike ambitions, and to pile up the war expenditures of the government in the future. When the nation, in its corporate capacity, comes to possess a tithe of the humanity which it has boasted to the world of having, all this will be reversed, and government people will deem it the chief glory to keep out of war, and to spend these vast sums in the works of saving and contructive benevolence.—Advocate of Peace.

FITNESS FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT.—An agent for American Christian Endeavor Societies having visited Manila and returned to this country, is reporting among various churches legitimate fruit of war which he witnessed among our men there. He says that religious effort is out of the question from American missionaries so long as there is an army, and such an army, as living examples, and, to the Tagalo mind, fair examples of American civilization and Christianity. "When American troops landed in Manila there were only a saloon or two in the whole place, and this one or two bore respectable names; were nothing at all what we know as saloons. Manila to-day is a hell hole. There are four hundred and thirty or more saloons, and the saloons are more respectable than are many of the places within the city which Americans have either planted or keep alive by their support."

THE WRONG OIL.—D. A. Hayes, of Garrett Biblical Institute, writes as follows: "In a suburb near Boston a belfry-bell suddenly changed its pitch, and sounded out a note or so higher than before, till the people of the church grew dissatisfied, and finally sent to the manufacturers to complain. The company sent a man down to see what was wrong, and he found that the sexton had oiled the belt, and had allowed two or three drops to fall on its rim. The two or three drops had made all the trouble.

Down in the country church there is a young man who speaks with no uncertain sound, who is full of clear ringing gospel Truth and experience. He goes up to the divinity school. They manufacture preachers there—polished, finished preachers of things divine. They put on the drops of oil. It is noticeable in his smooth tongue when he gets home again. But somehow he preaches a note or two higher than he did before. He talks about higher criticism now, when he used to talk only of Jesus. He is full of social science and ethical ethics and Chaldaic paraphrases and Greek roots, while he used to be full of Old Testament teachings and the life and words of the Christ. And somehow the people get dissatisfied with the tone. It is the drops of oil that have made all the trouble. They are all right in their place; but if they have replaced the anointing of the Holy One, they hinder more than they help.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

The Indians and Our Civilization.

In the annals of the American Revolution very dark and bloody is the recital which tells of the employment of Indians by the British Crown in its strenuous endeavor to overcome the colonies in revolt. Likewise, to the name Hessian has become attached a distinct stigma, because of the fact that for a mercenary consideration the Landgraf of Hesse-Cassel had been willing to hire out the soldiers of the electorate to subdue the Americans fighting against an oppressive government. In our present progress toward imperialism, we seem to be almost ready to embark upon methods which formerly we reprobated. Thus, a few days ago, a military officer, nephew of a United States Senator, called upon the President, with the request that he authorize the organization of an independent company of Indian scouts for service in the Philippines, a request which the President has referred to the Secretary of War.

Ten years ago the practice of permitting Indians to leave their reservations for engagement in Wild West shows was very much protested against. The then Commissioner of Indian Affairs, John H. Oberly, fully recognizing the truth of the averment of Senator Wilson, of Iowa, that such spectacular engagements were "not calculated to promote the best conditions of civilization among the Indians," urged, in a long communication to the Secretary of the Interior, that the precedents which had obtained in this matter be reversed, and that he "grant no further permission to take Indians for exhibition purposes." The harmful practice, however, does not seem to have been seriously interfered with, a very lax interpretation being put upon that requirement of the department which stipulates that a person of good moral character and habits shall accompany the Indians so released, and look to their interests and welfare. Thus, A. L. Riggs, of the Santee Agency, Nebraska, in an address on "The Moral Basis of Progress," at the Indian School Service Institute, held at Colorado Springs last year, remarked: "What, then, could be more senseless than that our Government, having taken up the work of civilizing the Indians, should at the same time cultivate barbarism by giving official approval and aid to Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show—turning our agencies into recruiting stations for him, where the young bloods grow long hair and divorce their wives, that they may be fitted to take part in this travelling orgy. This is the glorification of the old Indian, that we are trying so hard to get rid of. Our answer to the Indian of the dance and the Wild West Show should be that civilization is not a mere fashion. It is based upon principles of righteousness. We can believe in our social order, can defend and recommend it just so far as it has a moral basis, and no farther. . . Let us not fail to make use of every means open to us. Everything that intellectual enlightenment, industrial training and new conditions of life can bring us. But beyond that let us lay hold of the soul of the man, reinforce his conscience, open up for him all the avenues to the Divine, and remove all obstacles to his ascent. That which answers the deep need of Indian nature, as all human nature, is the highest Word of Revelation, 'As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become children of God.'" Says Estelle Reel, Superintendent of Indian Schools, in her first annual report (1898): "Indorsing the views and opinions of Dr. Riggs, whose knowledge of the Indian character has been acquired by an extensive experience, which has made him familiar with the habits and customs of the Indians, his conclusions are entitled to careful and prayerful consideration."*

Noticing in yesterday's daily paper a schedule of the weekly arrangements for intercollegiate foot-ball games this autumn between students of the Industrial Training School at Carlisle and those of other institutions in New York City, Utica, Cambridge, etc., and considering that many of these match games, played on the Seventh-day of the week, must carry the Carlisle scholars hundred of miles from the school and their customary places for religious worship, involving more or less travel on the First-day of the week to enable them to timely get back to their regular school duties, it occurred to me, that in learning this phase of our civilization, there was interposed an obstacle to the Indian lad's ascent such as the experienced instructor first quoted was concerned to caution against.

During the present month, Superintendent R. H. Pratt, of the Carlisle Training School, sent out a circular-letter of advice and inquiry to his patrons, in a certain rural locality, who receive Indian girls from the school into their homes, instructing them in domestic service and in other matters, in which he reminded them of the need of great care in the oversight of the temporarily assigned pupils, their correspondence, shopping, visiting, how they employ their time on the First-day of the week, &c. I felt a sympathy with the purpose of the superintendent's categorical inquiry, and so wrote to him. In so doing, it seemed pertinent to refer additionally to the fact that when, seven years ago, two of these girls were received into the household of the writer, they appeared content to wear the plain hats and simple, uniform attire of the institution whence they came, but, year by year since then, there seemed an increasing disposition to strive after the fashions, which indeed was not to be greatly wondered at, considering the example set them by so many of the white people. The earnest appeal of Dr. Judson to the Christian women of America who felt called to labor with him for the conversion of the Burmese and Karen women, was, that they should leave at home their ornaments and fine attire, lest those they came professedly to help should be beguiled thereby from the plain path of the pilgrim. The like argument holds good for the Indians in our homes, who must find it somewhat difficult to apprehend why they should not bedeck themselves with the feathers and plumes that were in common use among themselves not long ago, seeing that these things form the favorite hat ornamentation of those amongst whom they have now come.

The Training School Curriculum provides for, and gives a good deal of place to, instruction in music. Whether this course will prove permanently beneficial to the learners some of us would incline to question. Placed in families where there is no piano in the parlor, some express their dissatisfaction. One thus placed out desired a change, that she might practice on the mandolin—her companion that she might learn the use of the violin. While this kind of knowledge might open up to some the means of earning a livelihood, it does not seem to offer a fitting introduction to the practical after-life of these people, such as is so usefully supplied by the major part of the home-training which they receive. J. W. L.

*Since the above was written, the conference upon Indian affairs, in session at Lake Mohonk, has issued a report in which they record their disapproval of the taking of Indians from their reservations for the purposes of perpetuating, by public exhibition, the conditions of barbarism.

One Cause of Overstudy.

The question of overstudy in public schools is undoubtedly a serious one, and that teachers and the public are coming to realize the fact is amply shown by the interest aroused by the Tribune's publications upon the subject. With all due appreciation of the value of education, it may unhesitatingly be said that any system which cultivates the mind at the expense of physical vitality is a mischievous one. It is more than that. It is needlessly mischievous. No rational man will dispute for a moment the possibility of having mens sana in corpore sano —a cultivated brain and at the same time a healthy and robust body. Indeed, it is only through perversion of natural laws that the two are separated. That mind should naturally be keenest and most vigorous which dwells in the most perfect physical organism, and that body the healthiest and longest lived which is dominated by the most active and comprehensive intelligence. The brain study that dwarfs or weakens the body, and the physical training that stunts or leaves undeveloped the brain, must both be regarded as unnatural and misdirected.

In the discussion of the subject which has been brought out in the columns of the Tribune one cause of overstudy is mentioned by competent authorities which we are inclined to think may be among the foremost. That is the multiplicity of studies. There is a tendency here and there to require children to learn not too long lessons, but lessons in too many things. The idea seems to be that as "the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns" the scope of common-school study should be expanded to include them all. The "three R's" are nowhere near enough. There must be instruction in Lati and, of course, in French and German, in t sciences which have in late years been so ma vellously developed, in psychology and in a thetics, and in every branch of human lear ing, until the common school is a university epitome.

That, we are convinced, is an inexcusab evil. Beyond doubt the range and scope studies must be extended commensurately wi human progress. But such extension shou be at the top. College and university cours may be extended from four years to fourtee if necessary, to cover all the ground of liber culture. But the foundation of the system the primary schools remains the same. should be and must be a thorough groundi in the elements of learning, not a hurried a superficial skimming over the whole rang The pupil is to be taught, above all else, ho to study, how to use his mind, how to observ and how to reason from the results of his o servation. That is the best possible prepar tion for whatever more ample courses of stu he may subsequently pursue, and also for t practical work of life if his schooling sto with the common school. It will profit hi little to have a smattering of all other tongue ancient and modern, living and dead, if he do not know how to use his own aright. And ho many of the graduates of our common schoo are perfect in their English grammar; so pe fect that they unfailingly and involuntarily o serve all its rules through all their after life

We are not arguing against giving students glimpse of something beyond the "three R's But we believe in making sure first that tha are masters of the "three R's." There is litt use in teaching a boy the "pons asinorum" he is not able to explain the rule of simple su traction. It is idle to teach a girl French German if she does not know when to say " shall" and when to say "I will." It is of value to give lessons in psychology to tho who do not understand the Constitution of t United States, or to expatiate on archæolo to those who have not become familiar wi the modern history of their own land. T teacher of high attainments may find it irksor to confine his work to instruction in rudime tary branches. And the latter may not gi much chance for "showing off" at examin tions and commencements. But it is, after s the true work of the common school. And t common school that devotes most earnest a thorough attention to these simple and ru mentary branches will give its pupils the be preparation for the future, whatever that futu may be, and will most perfectly fulfil the pu pose for which the free common-school syste of this land was devised and established. will, moreover, to return to the topic unc present discussion, most surely avoid the e of overstudy.—The Tribune.

Made Right Inside.

Peace springs from within the soul, aski little odds as to outward circumstances. P and Silas, singing in the jail at Phillipi making their chains accompany a psalm David in expressing peace that the world c not give, have many successors to-day. T students of one of our largest universiti while fighting their way for an educati lled off one afternoon for a walk on the -path. They saw an old man with a rope his shoulder drawing a large boat partly l with stones. One of the students re- ked to the other, that being poor was hard igh, but being compelled to take the place mule was downright cruelty. As they near the old man they heard him singing g his way, the old gentleman cheerfully arking as they commiserated his hard lot, is all right, boys, only a mile more and I l have finished my week's work; to-morrow nday—a whole day with my family, and to worship God." They left him pulling he rope and humming, "Nearer, my God, to ."

nce, when accosting a man on his way home, ing a sack of flour on his back, and asking if he did not think it rather hard to work he week and then tramp home with such a , he replied, "God has made me inside so this fifty pounds of flour is more to me the finest team of horses to a millionaire, ou see, stranger, things are not so bad as seem; the trouble is inside of folks." Thus tow-path and the mountain road echo the it of the prisoners of Philippi, and Christ s peace, "not as the world giveth."—The rior.

Iowa Yearly Meeting.

wa Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at t Branch, Cedar County, Iowa, assembled Fourth-day, Tenth Month 11th, 1899. That was occupied by a session of the Meeting Ministers and Elders at 8 o'clock A. M., a ting for Worship at 10 A. M., and a session he Meeting for Sufferings at 3 P. M. At all e gatherings the attendance was larger n on like previous occasions.

uring the seven days of the Yearly Meet- a number of Meetings for Worship were , to which the public were invited, and on y occasion the comparatively large house filled by an evidently sincere, devout com- y, the periods of silence being manifestly eciated, and, it is believed, were opportu- es for communion of soul with soul and e with God.

he Friends engaged in verbal testimony nd all doubt made it clear that they were ely helped in the service. Testimonies to fundamental and general truths of the faith he Christian were pressed home with reach- power and fervent exhortation, not a few of hearers being tendered in heart by the ving cords of heavenly love, and nearly all itted that it was good to have the oppor- ty of being under such precious influence. he attendance at the business sessions, it is ved, was the largest in the history of the y, a greater number of the members being ent than usual, while a large company of nembers of Hickory Grove Quarterly Meet- much larger than heretofore, was some- g remarkable and gave helpful character to whole proceedings.

li H. Harvey and Thomas Elmore, minister elder respectively, of Western Yearly Meet- were present, having certificates from meetings, expressing unity with and libe- ng them for, the service they felt called to engage in within the limits of Iowa Yearly Meeting and elsewhere. Benjamin P. Brown, a minister of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, was also present with minutes from his Monthly and Quarterly Meetings.

The sense of weakness on account of the smallness and declension in membership, defective zeal and some unwatchfulness in the hour of temptation, was the occasion of much concern and deep exercise of spirit over the meeting while considering the state of society. Perplexed, but not in despair, cast down, but not destroyed, the faith of many was revived through ministry mediate and immediate, being made to remember that the remedy for troubles of every kind was to be found in entire dependence on the Lord God merciful and gracious, as He who made man can alone direct and guide him. All were counselled to commit their way unto the Lord and to trust Him, for He would assuredly bring it to pass.

The answers to the Queries showed an improved condition as compared with that of last year.

Correspondence.

Editor THE FRIEND,

Dear Friend:—Please accept my thanks for the few numbers of THE FRIEND thou sent me. I was pleased to see the face of a friend which my father took when I was a boy.

There has been a great change in our Society in sixty years. Our meetings have been presided over and conducted by a pastor; singing has been introduced, and I am sorry to say, instrumental music, also, in many cases.

The subject has been presented to New York and Indiana Yearly Meetings, and the former decided there is no place for instruments of any kind in our meeting for worship, and the latter gave its judgment that such a practice is entirely contrary to the principles of Friends. I have thought perhaps Philadelphia Meeting might consider the subject of sufficient importance to issue a document upon the subject.

I remarked to one of our prominent ministers that I thought that instruments of any kind were out of place, and an abomination in a Friends' meeting for worship. He replied, "I agree with thee." One of our most able ministers of New York Yearly Meeting writes that our success and power, even our spiritual life, depends upon our saying "No" unto any and every proposition to introduce instruments into our meetings for worship. Their use involves a mechanical arrangement, fatally interfering with our views and practices as held in all our church history.

Farmington Quarterly Meeting sixty years ago was one of the largest meetings in the Yearly Meeting. It has now not half the membership it had at that time. Several meetings that were flourishing then are now extinct. Our meetings are conducted the same as in other churches, our ministers and speakers have no appearance of Friends as formerly. Thy friend,

JESSE H. HAINES.

Items Concerning the Society.

AS REGARDS "SECTARIANISM."—Our concern is for the truth revealed to the Society of Friends; not for the sake of the Society, but for the sake of the Truth. We cannot, however, forget that Truth requires a living vehicle, and seeks its manifestation through the fellowship of holy souls.—Present Day Papers.

"A History of Quaker Government in Pennsylvania." Vol. II.—"The Quakers in the Revolution." By Isaac Sharpless, President of Haverford College. Philadelphia, T. S. Leach & Company, 29 N. Seventh St., 1899. This is the title of an interesting work just issued, a review of which we hope to publish later on.

An appointed meeting for worship under a concern of three Friends from Philadelphia was held on Sixth-day evening, the 27th ult., at Smithville, near Leeds Point, N. J., in a meeting-house on the site of a former Friends' meeting—an occasion remarkably visited by large numbers from the surrounding country, and especially by life from on high.

Joseph S. Elkinton, after a satisfactory mission to the authorities in Washington in the interest of Russian Doukhobors, has gone with William B. Harvey, of West Grove, to the settlements in Manitoba to direct the distribution of supplies. J. S. Elkinton telegraphed from Winnipeg on the 29th that he had arrived safely, had interviewed the commissioner, and might go to Yorkton on the thirty-first with a large company of Doukhobors.

Notes from Others.

A boy was passing a saloon, and seeing a drunken man lying in the gutter in front of it, he opened the door and said: "Mister, your sign's fell down." The saloonkeeper chased him half around the square. —Current Anecdotes.

THE DANGER OF GOING TOO FAR.—Overdoing is undoing. A cake burned to a crisp is as much a failure as a cake half baked. An audience wearied, confused and vexed with too many points in a sermon, or too many addresses is an audience hindered instead of helped.—Churchman.

THE ENTERTAINMENT BUSINESS.—The Free Methodist church prohibits the use of instrumental music in the public worship. We as a people have seen that their use ministered to pride and vain pomp. "Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary," says the Psalmist. There is coming into other churches the fallacy that if you would reach a man's heart with truth you must first give him something to please. Hence, so much of music, pictures, images, flowers, concerts and festivals. O Christ, keep thy scourge of small cords with which to preserve thy temples clean from the lust of the flesh and the pride of life. —Free Methodist.

BLUNDERS AS DISCIPLINE AND NOT AS HINDRANCES. —One usually bright woman having given up to speak in a meeting, remarked that she "hoped to do better in the past than she had in the future." Then she sat down, never to rise again in meeting, covered with great confusion, and never could forget her mistake. It has crippled her for life, though she is capable of great things, had she only been able to let her mistake go and forget the past, and press forward to that which was before her. The devil is always gratified if he can induce a genuine Christian, capable of great usefulness, to so grieve over some blunder of his as to entirely quit serving God again in that form of service.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A protocol has been drawn between Russia and the United States, by which the former country agrees to arbitrate the claims for damages for the seizure of American sealing vessels off the coast of Siberia. Russia's claim is that a country's marine jurisdiction should be extended a distance of seven miles from shore.

The annual report of the Dead Letter Office shows that it received from all sources 6,855,983 pieces of mail matter, nearly 9 per cent. increase over last year. Of these over 145,000 consisted of insufficiently paid mail, a quarter million were undelivered letters to hotel addresses, over 167,000 unclaimed parcels, and more than half a million pieces foreign mail. Mail directed to fictitious addresses decreased by 45 per cent., indicating a notable restriction in operations of fraudulent concerns. More than three-quarters of a million letters and parcels sent to the Dead Letter Office were subsequently delivered to the owners unopened, and money drafts, etc., found in the dead mails aggregated a face value of $1,168,000.

The Director of the Mint reports that the world's gold production in 1898 was 13,904,363 ounces, of the value of $287,428,900. Of this the United States produced 3,118,398 ounces, Transvaal 3,831,975 ounces and Australia 3,137,644 ounces.

Of the ten billion dollars' worth of gold produced in the world since the discovery of America more than one-half has been produced since 1860 and more than one-fourth since 1885. Or, to put it in other words, one-half of the gold product of the last 400 years has been produced within forty years, and one-fourth within fifteen years.

It appears that one-fourth of our boasted export trade with the Philippines consists of intoxicating liquors.

It was announced in steel circles in Pittsburg last week, that the largest order for steel rails ever given had just been awarded to the Steel Rail Pool. The order calls for 1,500,000 tons of rails at the prevailing price, $33, for delivery in 1900. Nearly every railroad company is interested. The rails will be supplied by the Carnegie, Federal, Pennsylvania Steel, Cambria Steel Companies and the Lackawanna Steel and Iron Company. The order means that the iron and steel market for next year will be tied up, all other things being laid aside, as the steel output of the entire country amounts to only a little over 6,000,000 tons per year, and of this nearly one-fourth will be used for this contract, which involves $50,000,000.

In Kansas, persons convicted of murder in the first degree are sentenced to be hanged whenever the Governor shall sign their death warrants. No Governor has ever signed a death warrant, and so the penitentiary contains many prisoners under sentence to be hanged.

The city of Boston has increased its debt by $3,124,442 since Twelfth Month 30th, 1898. The gross debt is now $84,426,378.88.

There is a lemon grove of 1000 acres in San Diego, Cal., and it is said to be the largest in the world. It was begun in 1890, when 170 acres were planted, and it has been annually added to until it has reached its present size.

Last week mountain fires in Central and Western Pennsylvania destroyed valuable timber tracts and menaced houses and barns. At Blairsville the smoke was so dense on the 26th it was necessary to close the school.

Henry C. Harris, Supreme Judge of the Choctaw Nation, died at his home in the Indian Territory on Tenth Month 26th.

Horace L. Hastings, editor and publisher of The Christian, died at his home in Goshen, Mass., on Tenth Month 21st, of typhoid fever, aged 68 years. He was the author of papers, books, tracts and pamphlets, known as "The Anti-Infidel Library." H. L. Hastings had edited every number of The Christian for more than thirty years. He wrote the familiar verses beginning, "Shall we meet beyond the river?" In 1888 he came into prominence by preaching on Boston Common in disregard of a city ordinance which required him to have a license. He was arrested, fined and imprisoned in Charles Street jail. The agitation resulting from this action caused an overturning of the city government.

There were 342 deaths in this city last week, which is 42 less than the previous week and 4 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 169 were males and 173 females: 43 died of consumption; 34 of heart diseases; 27 of pneumonia; 20 of marasmus; 19 of diphtheria; 16 of cancer; 15 of apoplexy; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 10 of inflammation of the brain; 10 from casualties, and 9 of debility.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from Cape Town, dated Tenth Month 25th, says there has been another battle near Ladysmith, Natal Colony, and that the Boers were repulsed. The British casualties were placed at thirteen killed, ninety-three wounded and three missing. General White cables from Ladysmith on Tenth Month 30th that he employed all the troops there in a battle with the besieging Boers. He reports the British losses at between 80 and 100, and "those of the enemy much greater." The fight lasted several hours.

The question of dealing with the refugees at Cape Town is assuming serious proportions. The Women's Committee, which is apart from the General Committee, have over 1,000 women and children to feed and house daily.

It is estimated that the amount paid in London at auction sales of second hand books last year was £125,000. A feature of the year has been the large number of rare books offered, and the exceptionally high prices obtained for them.

The Russians are preparing for the Paris Exposition of 1900 a map of France in stone, which will be a remarkable specimen of the lapidary's skill. It will show each separate district in jasper, while the sea will be represented by lapis lazuli, marked by precious stones.

After a long and patient struggle, the women physicians of Russia have secured a decree placing them upon an equality both socially and politically with the male physicians in the Empire.

Exclusive of the Ural fields there are 851 places in Siberia where gold is found.

The natives of Corea have developed a strong prejudice against the operation of electric cars in their country, owing to the fact that the company allows women to ride in the vehicles. This is regarded by the Coreans as a dangerous step towards women's rights.

The Kashmir Railway is to be constructed over 186 miles in the most mountainous part of India. It will be operated by electricity, water power being used. This permits of a much lighter motor for drawing the same load and also permits of grades which a steam engine could not climb without recourse to the rack system.

Near Grogbogana, Java, there is a lake of boiling mud about two miles in circumference. Immense columns of steaming mud are constantly arising and descending.

Intelligence is bronght by the Rinsa Maru, which arrived at Victoria, B. C., Tenth Month 25th, that a typhoon, through which the Empress and Senator passed, proved even more disastrous on land than on sea. In Tokio and Yokohama it raged with great fierceness. Hundreds of houses were wrecked in all districts, though the storm seems to have been attended with less loss of life than usual.

News of another disastrous catastrophe comes from Tagonaura, between Numadzu and Suzukawa. About one o'clock, on Tenth Month 7th, a tidal wave swept over Tagonaura. Over 200 houses were destroyed and more than 100 people perished. The northern portion of Yoshiwa Meiwa was converted into an extensive lake. A number of boats were engaged in the search for the bodies. Great misery and suffering prevail.

It is no unusual thing for a vessel plying between Japan and London to carry 1,000,000 fans as a single item of its cargo.

A Caracas despatch says that General Hernandez has had a rupture with the new Venezuelan Government and had left for Ocumare to start a new revolution.

The Montreal Herald states that pest instead of spruce wood for paper pulp is expected to revolutionize the paper industry in the Dominion. The opening of the peat fields and the development of this industry will retard, in some measure, the destruction of the forests, which have, during recent years, become steadily decreased on account of the enormous drain for various purposes, not the least being that of making pulp from spruce for the manufacture of paper. Canadian peat deposits are inexhaustible, and statisticians claim that there is sufficient to cover the consumption of paper for about three centuries. The method of making paper pulp from peat is a simple one, being a cold process, alkali solution being used for disintegrating and bleaching. A 400 ton daily capacity mill will be erected near Montreal shortly. The cost will be about $10,000. A sulphide mill of the same capacity would cost over half a million dollars, and require extensive water powers.

The Canadian Minister in London has made a final proposition to Ambassador Choate for a permanent settlement of the Alaska dispute by arbitration, similar to the Venezuelan arbitration. By this Canada hopes to receive Pyramid harbor by surrendering much of the disputed gold country.

There are 850,000 men in the world who gain a livelihood chiefly by fishing, making an annual catch of $225 worth of fish for each man. The fisheries of the United States supply 800,000 pounds annually, and those of Europe 1,800,000 pounds.

DIED, at the residence of his brother-in-law, Joseph Armstrong, near West Branch, Iowa, Ninth Month 2d, 1899, SAMUEL OLIPHANT, in the seventieth year of his age. He was an esteemed member of Hickory Grove Monthly Meeting of Friends. His last illness of about a year's duration was characterized by much distressing weakness, and though aware that he could not be continued long on probation, the serenity of his spirit was remarkable, occasioned as it was by the firm belief that through the mercy of a loving Saviour it would be well with him in the future—he being in possession of a measure of that peace which passeth all understanding.

Conflicting Duties.

e have not yet seen Caroline Hazard's book "The Narragansett Friends Meeting," but llowing notice of it, found in The Literary d seems to us itself to deserve a notice.

s narrative of Quaker beginnings in Rhode in the eighteenth century is by Caroline d, recently inaugurated president of Wellesley ge. It is a careful and admirable piece of and Miss Hazard does all that grace of style o toward making up for the dryness of her ct.

, truth to tell, the Quakers of Rhode Island, h a persecuted, were not an interesting peo- They were narrow, they were self-sufficient ictatorial, they were—after the rule of their -meddlesome and interfering in the extreme. were also disposed to rank self-imposed duties natural ones. We know no historical par- except that of "Sainte Chantal" to the case tience Greene, who, in 1771, elected to travel eligious visit as far south as Georgia, leaving fant family "seeming to require her nursing tion," and "a beloved weakly husband." There emained thirteen months and returned to find nild dead and another dying. This, however, ot discourage her from going later to England our years, where she visited prisons and held ngs, and tried in vain to see the king and ad- ed Welsh audiences through an interpreter; all exciting and soul filling, though not so dis- y her duty as rearing her own children, and ng the home in Rhode Island comfortable for beloved weakly husband." Distant duties are the most compelling.

s Hazard's account of the Quaker persecutions ston is admirably full and clear. They led to migration of the Friends to the Narragansett ry, where their settlement powerfully affected rowth and shaping of the colony, and where influence is felt to our own day.

e can have no sympathy with a disposition rank self-imposed duties above natural " or with one's "electing," without being ked, "to travel on a religious visit leaving an infant family," or husband, or wife, requiring attention. But we do enter our protest against the assumption that any duties other than natural ones must be self-imposed. There may be duties higher, while they last, than natural ones, duties imposed by the witness of the Divine Spirit in the heart.

Of course any one who does not believe in the direct operation of the Divine Spirit on man's sense of duty, will contend that there are no higher than natural duties; or that if there are spiritual duties, a man has no right to listen to apparent spiritual duties in preference to natural ones.

Our natural duties are in general a standing engagement, a Divine requirement, until superseded by a higher order. But they who believe they have a special call from Heaven to discharge a certain commission are recreant to duty if they violate their sense of the Divine will by continuing in what were natural duties when the higher call was absent.

The reviewer, if professing the popular Christianity of the times, would probably praise a man who should leave a dependent family in obedience to his country's call for soldiers to destroy men's lives in a foreign field. But it is not until one leaves his home under a sense of the call of his Divine Master, who "came not to destroy, but to save men's lives," that we are wont to hear the objection made that "Duties never conflict."

And indeed real duties do not conflict. That which is one's highest duty for the time being stands supreme, and nothing which could conflict with it can then be his duty. The will of God alone constitutes anything a duty, and its latest living expression in one's conscience is his latest obligation, cancelling all previous engagements that might for the time seem conflicting with it. We can be in but one right place at a time.

Yet Divine authority will seldom suspend the duties of fatherhood, motherhood, or the offices of natural affection. Exceptions will be rare to the rule that "he that will not provide for his own family is worse than an unbeliever." But the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has its eminent domain above all private interests, even sometimes, as He said, to the forsaking of father and mother and all else for his sake and the gospel's; and if such right be conceded to human governments, much more clearly does it belong to the King of kings, and the Lord of lords.

His will alone creates the duty of civil obedience, or any higher duty that he may by his Spirit at any time dispense to a human heart. So that by following the highest law for the season at hand, duties can never conflict, though interests may. "We ought to obey God rather than men," is a rule as valid now as it was for the early church. And it is they who are truest to this principle who make the best and most profitable subjects of civil government, and the truest members and helpers of their own homes. They are of that righteousness which exalts a nation, they are separate from sin which is a reproach to any people; they maintaining their allegiance to a higher law than the law of the land are the best subjects that the law of the land can have, and are the very people whom a country can least afford to spare. They are the least expensive for prisons (except to persecute them), for police, for courts, for maintenance of public peace and order. They are the class most productive of the fruits of industry and all elements of a country's prosperity. Russia to-day little sees what a wealth she has lost in exiling those valiant soldiers of Peace who love Christ's truth and man's brotherhood better than any country; and Canada as yet little realizes what a centre of prosperity she has planted in her western domain, through her opening a way on her statute-book for a people whose Lord is the Prince of Peace, in preference to any lower statute-book.

The difference between electing and being elected to go as on a Divine service, means the difference between making up and taking up our daily cross. No man, no government of men, no church, no priest can decide it for a man; for it is a question between the individual soul and his God, between whom none has the right to stand but Christ, the mediator, the living Word for duty. How shall we know that our duties are not self-imposed but by learning to know his voice, as He said his sheep should know it? By watchful obedience to the secret intimations of truth in our hearts, we shall learn to know the Truth, and the Truth shall make us free in the way of his commandments. A stranger who knows not this voice may easily call all duties but natural ones "self imposed" and their followers "self-elected;" but they who become "quick of understanding in the fear of the Lord," are daily attentive to the secret word of his grace which is able to build them up in all spiritual understanding in the knowledge of Him. We usually need light ahead for only one duty at a time, and that is the next one, however, little and common it may seem; and faithfulness in that is a stepping into a clearer and clearer vision to discern between that in us "which serveth God and that which serveth Him not;" so that the error of those who place "self imposed duties above natural ones" may not be ours.

For "The Friend."

Friends and the Indians of Pennsylvania.

The sufferings which many of the first settlers of Pennsylvania had undergone in their native country had, as we may well believe, rendered them very tender of the feelings and convictions of others, and predisposed them to sympathize with and assist those less favored than themselves. This disposition of mind upon their arrival in this country soon made its way in the hearts of the natives with whom they came in contact, and as it was maintained, secured to them their unbroken friendship.

Before the settlement of Pennsylvania, Geo. Fox and other ministering Friends from England, in the course of their religious visits had meetings with the Indians in different places, and endeavored to set before them the truths of the gospel. The former writing to Friends in Pennsylvania and West Jersey expressly counselled them to "Let them (the natives), know the principles of Truth, so that they may know the way of salvation, and the nature of true Christianity, and how Christ hath died for them."

The interest of William Penn in the Indians began before he became personally acquainted with them. While yet in England, before embarking for America on his first voyage, he addressed a letter to them, which is replete with evidences of his religious concern for them, and his desire that the dealings of the settlers of his colony with them should be just and honorable.

The Indians whom he thus addressed were those who would now be called heathen, and it is worthy of notice, how confidently William Penn appeals to that sense of the Almighty Being which He himself has implanted in every heart, that Divine grace purchased for mankind by the offering of Christ, and which Friends have always believed would be sufficient, if heeded, to guide mankind in the way of salvation, even those who may never have become acquainted with the records contained in the Holy Scriptures. The letter referred to is as follows:

"London, the eighteenth of Eighth Month, 1681.

"My Friends:—There is a great God and power that hath made the world and all things therein, to whom you and I and all people owe their being and well being; and to whom you and I must some day give an account for all that we do in the world. This great God hath written his law in our hearts, by which we are taught and commanded to love and help, and do good to one another, and not to do harm and mischief one unto another. Now this great God hath been pleased to make me concerned in your part of the world, and the king of the country where I live hath given me a great province therein, but I desire to enjoy it with your love and consent, that we may always live together as neighbors and friends; else what would the great God do to us? who hath made us not to devour and destroy one another, but to live soberly and kindly together in the world. Now I would have you well observe, that I am very sensible of the unkindness and injustice that have been too much exercised towards you by the people of these parts of the world, who have sought themselves, and to make great advantages by you, rather than to be examples of justice and goodness unto you, which I hear hath been matter of trouble to you, and caused great grudgings and animosities, sometimes to the shedding of blood, which hath made the great God angry. But I am not such a man, as is well known in my own country. I have great love and regard towards you, and I desire to win and gain your love and friendship by a kind, just and peaceable life, and the people I send are of the same mind, and shall in all things behave themselves accordingly, and if anything shall offend you or your people, you shall have a full and speedy satisfaction for the same by an equal number of just men on both sides, that by no means you may have just occasion of being offended against them. I shall shortly come to you myself, at which time we may more largely and freely confer and discourse of these matters; in the meantime I have sent my commissioners to treat with you about land, and a firm league of peace. Let me desire you to be kind to them and the people, and receive these presents and tokens which I have sent you, as a testimony of my good will to you, and my resolution to live justly, peaceably and friendly with you. I am your loving friend,

"William Penn."

William Penn and his fellow colonists, upon landing in this country, found the Indians already more or less closely associated with the white race. The settlements of the Dutch, the Swedes and the English upon the banks of the Delaware during the previous forty years had introduced them to some knowledge of their civilization, their habits and their vices.

The use of intoxicating liquors to excess was one of the evils to which some of the Indians had become accustomed, and Friends soon became concerned lest any of their members should be engaged in furnishing them, and in the Quarterly Meeting held in Philadelphia, First Month 7th, 1686-7, the following minute was adopted:

"It is requested by this Quarterly Meeting that Friends of each Monthly Meeting take care to make inquiry concerning any that profess truth, that may sell rum to the Indians directly or indirectly by any pretence whatsoever and also to appoint some Friends by their respective meetings to take care in that behalf that such disorders may be kept under and the Truth kept clear."

This subject was the occasion of further action by the Yearly Meeting, and several minutes were made at different times in relation to it. In the minute of the Quarterly Meeting of Philadelphia, held Fourth Month 6th, 1687, the following advice appears which shows the care of Friends and the frontier condition of the settlement:

"It is the advice of this meeting to all Friends to caution them to be careful that they buy neither hogs, bells, or anything else of the Indians which be suspected that they came not honestly by, and therefore Friends are desired to warn all that they suspect in that behalf to be careful."

The following Minute also shows the de of Friends for the best welfare of the India

In the Quarterly Meeting held First Mo 3rd, 1689-90, "It being referred to this me ing of some way to be serviceable to the dians, after debating the matter Friends h thought fit to recommend the same to next meeting of public Friends for their c sideration, and desire Thomas Duckett John Hart to move the matter to them, further it is the desire of Friends that Sam Richardson may request in the behalf of meeting that the Council would consider some means to regulate the great abuses upon the said Indians, by letting them have r to the dishonor of the province and Friend

Among the members of the Monthly Meet of Friends of Philadelphia, who was concer for the welfare of the Indians was Willi Southeby, who occupied positions of respo bility both in civil and religious Society, the latter of which he was sometimes enga in the ministry. He occasionally commit his sentiments to writing, and in the Mont Meeting held Fifth Month 29th, 1698, the lowing minute occurs:

"The paper of William Southeby concern trading with the Indians was read, whereu Griffith Owen is desired to speak with J Stephens to go to the Indians to speak w them in order to appoint time and place for m ing with them at one of their Indian towns

John Stephens was acquainted with the guage of the Lenni Lenape, and in the capac of an interpreter was probably useful on occasion, but no further mention of the occ rence appears in the minutes.

Govern Your Tongue.

True piety has its seat in the heart. Bu manifests itself in words as well as in the tions. It teaches us what not to say, as w as what to say. James says, "If any m among you seem to be religious, and bridl not his tongue, but deceiveth his own he this man's religion is vain" (Jas. i: 26).

"There are but ten precepts of the law God," says Leighton, "and two of them, so as concerns the outward organ and vent of sins there forbidden, are bestowed on tongue—one in the first table, and the ot in the second—as though it were ready t out against both God and man if not thus dled."

Pythagoras used to say that a wound f the tongue is worse than a wound from a sw for the latter affects only the body, the for the spirit—the soul.

It was a remark of Anacharsis, that tongue was at the same time the best pa man and his worst; that with good governt none is more useful, and without it none i mischievous.

Boerhaave, says Dr. Johnson, was never so by calumny and detraction, nor even tho it necessary to confute them; "For," he "they are sparks which, if you do not them, will go out of themselves."

"We cannot," says Cato, "control the tongues of others, but a good life enable to despise them."

"Slander," says Lacon, "cannot make subjects of it either better or worse. It represent us in a false light, or place a s of us in a bad one; but we are the same.

t so the slanderer; the slander that he utters kes him worse, the slandered never."
'No one," says Jerome, "loves to tell a tale scandal except to him who loves to hear it.

Samuel Capper's Visit.

On the thirteenth, after dining at Upper ir-abbey on the way, we went to Tipperary, ere we held a large meeting in the Tent; it not appear that any means were specially d by the priests to interfere with our inten-s; it was supposed that five hundred persons e present, who were most properly behaved very attentive; some slight sensation of urbance was occasioned by the apprehenfor a few minutes, that a priest was come oming; about six or eight persons left the ting in consequence. We have reason to very thankful that one more meeting has n held, in which we believe that the cause
'ruth has not suffered.
n the fourteenth we held a meeting at Clog-
; this meeting was rather differently comed to some we have held. There were pres-two or three families of Friends of the lthier sort; in one of their yards the meet-was held; the Protestant incumbent of the sh and about sixty of the lower class of nanists attended. The opportunity was one 'hich close searching doctrine was applied, in which I obtained great relief. Had my d been more at liberty for such enjoyments, ould have had much pleasure from the t of the Knockmilldown Mountains, close he feet of which this town stands, and the e distant Galtees; it is a lovely country, the great riches and great unfaithfulness he Friends, with the tryanny and darkness ne priests, are sources of so much painful ection, that the face of the country seems red by them.
he week-day meeting at Cahir on the fifth was an awful opportunity. I hope it be of use to some. At seven o'clock the e evening, we had a public meeting in the in an orchard near the castle of the earl lengall. It was attended by three hundred our hundred, I believe, and was a satisfacmeeting to our friends; to myself, it was borious one, as I felt worn with so much tion, and its being held also on the same as the week-day meeting, which had been ason of great conflict to me; besides which as deeply tried to see the testimonies of h let down as they are, and the spirit of world reigning in those who profess to be disciples of Him, whose kingdom is not of world.
he next meeting we attempted was at Thurles, the darkest and most popish place I have yet been in; here were besides myself and Robert Charlton, Samuel Davis, Samuel Fayle, Joseph Tennell, Thomas Going, John B. Clibborne and Joseph Clibborne. We obtained readily the best site in the town for a meeting, that in the yard of the court-house, which was granted by two Romish magistrates, and both they and the keeper of the premises seemed extremely friendly. All went on apparently smooth until we arrived at the meeting place; the first symptom of unpleasant feeling, though I was not without a lively apprehension of it, was, that with the exception of a few little children, and about half a dozen grown-up persons, no one would sit down, but about one hundred and fifty persons stood at the entrance of the tent, just within it, and many more stood outside; they remained stationary, though more than once invited to sit down—some appeared waiting for some movement, others seemed to be afraid to be seen seated. One of our friends observed a priest, or perhaps a monk, for there is a large college and monastery or nunnery in this town, standing behind the curtains of the tent at my back, whilst I was endeavoring to induce the people to take seats. The keeper of the yard, who had before appeared so friendly, began to box the children's ears and to drive them out, talking loud, as I thought, by way of warning to the grown-up persons. Very soon after came a little black, malicious-countenanced man, an emissary of the priests, and drove the people all out before him, saying many bitter things, as, that it was a pity the ropes of the tent were not all cut, etc. We remained a short time, but found there was not a hope of obtaining a meeting. We were therefore obliged to give up the attempt.

From Thurles we rode eight miles to Templemore, but the report of our treatment at that place had been carried here, and we found it in vain to try to obtain a place for the tent, or a room of any description, so we returned the next day to Clonmel.

On the nineteenth of the Sixth Month, I attended the First-day morning meeting. At one o'clock the remains of Elizabeth Davis was buried, and in the evening we had a public meeting in Friends' meeting-house. The interment was the occasion of a great concourse of people being collected together, as is usual in this country, and I hope that the opportunity may be beneficially remembered by many. The meeting in the evening was large, and the house very full. I have seldom, according to my apprehension, been present at a more favored season, though a large portion of the meeting were Romanists; yet a sense of the sincerity and devotedness of the spirits of many were such, as seemed to open the way for deep instruction, and in the end for such access in prayer, as it was truly cheering to experience.

On Second-day we went to Urlingford, County Kilkenny, a wretchedly dark Popish place; here the spirit of opposition was very strong. No suitable place could be obtained for the erection of the tent. At seven o'clock we held a meeting in an outhouse belonging to the hotel, the master of which is one of three Protestant families residing in this town; for some time only six or eight persons came, and amongst them two policemen—sober, quiet persons, but at last we had from one hundred to one hundred and twenty persons present. A considerable part were quiet and attentive persons, really, I believe, desirous of being helped and profited, but others, especially some youths of both sexes were in a light and frivolous disposition, evidently feeling at full liberty to indulge their evil propensities, from the knowledge that they would be acting in conformity with the wish of their teachers. When the meeting broke up they proceeded to act with great rudeness, shouting and screeching for hours about the house. Some friends who left the hotel in the evening were hooted after and pelted with dirt, and one young man lost his hat, which was kicked to pieces. No conception, without being in contact with it, can well be formed of the bitter and rancored feeling of the priests and their coadjutors; they feel that their power is in danger from the increased sobriety of the people, and every nerve seems strained to keep out light from their minds; the iron bondage and oppression of these over the people is truly horrible.

We returned to Clonmel through New Birmingham and Fethard; at neither of these places did it appear practicable to get the people together; such was the influence of the priests that no place to meet in, nor spare room, or place to erect the tent, could be obtained.

The incomplete relief I have been able to obtain, though accompanied by the knowledge that I have endeavored to do what has been required, yet leaves a painful feeling of unaccomplished exercise of mind, I believe that I must still seek further opportunities amongst this poor people.

[In deference, however, to the judgment of his Select Quarterly Meeting in view of the dangers and difficulties which Samuel Capper had encountered, and the unsettled state of the communities in which he would bestow labor, he felt it his place to leave his burden with the meeting, and relinquish the further prosecution of his concern.—ED.]

For "THE FRIEND."

"Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

In a recent experience of travel and of sojourn in a neighborhood remote from any meeting of Friends, the writer has been strengthened in the conviction that if our younger members are but faithful in the support of the distinctive doctrines and testimonies long upheld by the Society of Friends, they will find that their light is indeed "set upon a candlestick," and that there will be a constant service rendered our blessed Lord and Master, among both professors and profane; that in a faithful bearing of the cross day by day there will be a quiet rebuke to such as walk disorderly, and that among the more seriously minded opportunity will not be wanting to bear testimony to the spirituality and the heart-cleansing character of the religion of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Also, that in thus displaying a banner for the Truth before a world lying in wickedness, the distinctively plain dress so long worn by our people is a helpful factor of no small value. As we passed along, the dress of a Friend, revived with some a warm and kindly interest because of family connection with Friends, or because of associations of earlier days. At other times, individuals were placed upon inquiry regarding our distinctive views, and an opportunity was thus afforded to testify in their behalf. Our appearance also paved the way for an acceptance of that in our conduct and conversation which did not accord with common, though often, corrupt usage. That we did not play at cards, read novels, attend the theatre, nor indulge in music was surprising to some professors of religion, as well as to those not within the pale of any church organization. The keeping on of the hat in the presence of women, and upon some other occasions (a testimony for which William Penn and other early Friends suffered so much) would, perhaps, hardly have been faithfully borne had not the general appearance of a Friend strengthened therefor. The quiet pause before meals seemed a sweet opportunity to render thankful homage, and to own allegiance to the great Lord of heaven and earth, and perhaps was a gentle rebuke to some professors of religion who gave back from the more circumstantially "spoken grace." Urgent invitations to attend a neighboring place of worship, where a paid and stated ministry was upheld and supported, gave opportunity to testify of our religious convictions regarding Divine worship. And we were able to illustrate the practicability of the two or the three gathering in the quiet chamber for this solemn purpose. In Christian solicitude for the souls of the families of the neighborhood we were enabled to press home upon what appeared to be loving and receptive hearts the spiritual nature of Divine worship, also our testimony to a free and freshly anointed Gospel ministry, our privileges and responsibilities as individuals in this glorious Gospel day, and the great need of our experiencing, each one for one, the new birth unto righteousness, and the heart-cleansing power of Divine grace, if ever we are fitted for an inheritance with the saints in light. In this service a faithful maintenance of our testimonies seemed no hinderance from admission to the hearts of the people. An elderly man, a fellow guest at the house where we were stopping, in his younger days was associated with a business house whose head was a member of the Society of Friends. He mentioned the faithfulness of this Friend in attending mid-week meetings, and evidently had a high regard for him as being one who carried his religion into his everyday life. Another guest, an intelligent and agreeable Roman Catholic woman, the wife of a physician, now came to a knowledge of the Society of Friends for the first time, and was much interested in their faith and practice, repeatedly remarking, "What a beautiful religion." She had lived most if not all of her life within a few miles of a somewhat prominent Friends' meeting, yet had no knowledge of them! Would such ignorance of our people and of the pure Christian doctrine we profess have existed had the Friends of that meeting made the distinctive appearance so long borne by faithful members of our Society? With most of us it is long before the offense of the cross ceases. To make a plain appearance, to keep to the Scripture language of thee and thou, to avoid the usual salutations, etc., among those who do not understand the ground of our different appearance and practice, is often trying to the creaturely part; yet this cross quietly and patiently borne, has a steadying effect upon our airy natures, tends to humble us under the Master's yoke, and often is as a wall upon either side to keep us in the path of safety. Friends have held a distinctive place among religious professors, and there yet seems abundant ground for the conviction that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but that in the supporting of their peculiar doctrines and testimonies they have been owned and blessed of our Heavenly Father, and have indeed been as a light upon a candlestick, giving light to those about them. We believe that the rising generation will if faithful, find abundant work and service for the dear Master upon lines that have been so signally blessed in the past, that a birthright in the Society of Friends is no accident, and that the best and truest service lies in the channels which our Heavenly Father chooses for us.

My Experience in a Mad-house.

BY MAURICE RUBEN.

[In offering the following narrative for our columns, a Friend writes that the subject of it is "a person we have been interested in, having known him for some years."]

Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you. I Peter iv: 12.

I was directed to the study of the new Testament, and heeding the instruction of Jesus to "search the Scriptures," the Holy Spirit applied the words of truth from "Moses" and the "Prophets" and the "Psalms" which lifted me out of rationalism and Judaism, and upon meeting the conditions scripturally required, viz: Repentance toward God and faith in Jesus Christ, I experienced conversion which entirely changed the manner of my life, the habits and desires from the worldly plane to a spiritual condition of right and duty and conscience toward God and man, and recognizing and accepting in Christ the one power of God unto salvation, that in Him are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge and who is made unto us wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption.

The awakening of my soul to the realization of the grace and love of God towards me, who was indeed a "sinner," and the consciousness of a higher calling, led me to a closer study of the Scriptures and as the Holy Spirit graciously revealed to me to follow in the footsteps of "Abraham," the man of faith and obedience, I came out from a big business connection and made a full and complete consecration, in accordance with the conditions of the New Testament.

Some of these conditions are quite critical: see Luke xiv: 26, 27, verse 33 reads: So likewise, whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple.

Recognizing the spiritual blindness upon the Jewish people, and that such blindness is removed only in Christ, and that "there is no other name given under heaven among men whereby we must be saved"—and that the Jews evidently do not understand the scheme of redemption, although they had the temple service and the law, and the sacrifices and ought to have understood that without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin. However, "without controversy great is the mystery of Christ," and as "Sterne" says: "Is it not an amazing thing that men shall attempt to inve tigate the mystery of the redemption, when, a the same time, that it is propounded to us a an article of faith solely, we are told that 'th very angels have desired to pry into it i vain?'"

Our readers, therefore, can imagine the sur prise and consternation my conversion create among my Jewish relatives and friends— "stone of stumbling and a rock of offense. Desiring to speak the "words of soberness an truth," my people evidently thought I had gon beside myself, because "much learning dot make thee mad." It would take a volume t relate all the incidents of the early days of m Christian experience, the many complicatio and stumbling blocks which menaced me on a sides. "Teach me thy way, O Lord, and lea me in a plain path, because of mine enemie Deliver me not over unto the will of min enemies: for false witnesses are risen u against me, and such as breathe out cruelty Ps. xxvii: 11-12.

During the hour of church time, I nipped my God, indeed, in the meditation y heart, feeling greatly uplifted by the ion and meditation. The hours of the noon sped along, and toward evening, again the folds of night gathered around er Earth, the door of my cell was opened I was introduced to two gentlemen, who rogated me in reference to my conversion religious experience. I had come to the usion that my state of mind was in ques- and conjectured that these gentlemen , no doubt, "experts," and thus I was rally prompted to be quite "natural" and nswer in a simple manner. To speak, for nce, to "insanity experts" about the ange of heart," the "carnal mind," the ly Spirit," or "sanctification," from a n cell, would, indeed, be sufficient evidence e Oakland M. E. I learned that P. H. Laufman, the vener- class leader of the church, who was among visitors, made strenuous efforts to effect release, offering a large amount of bail. I realized that I was good for another night, I want the dear reader to understand that ically I am not strong, and though I seemed ave much fortitude, I would feel a wave of sorrow. I would then think of Jesus and semane, and of his disciples as He spoke hem: "Sit ye here while I go and pray er." Matt. xxvi: 36. I prayed much and tated more, and I can not tell all my ghts of that night. The past rose before Saints and Martyrs and others who suffered Christ, all the faithful and heroic souls— e past and present—and then to think to ounted worthy to become partaker in these afflictions. Monday morning dawned t and clear. Again no hearing. My ner with some relatives, called; he looked bled—inquired after my health and thought lion had put me in a nice box—that the icians considered me insane and I would tably be taken to a private institution for ument. It seemed to me that the hand of ace in Pittsburg had been moved back to the early days of Christianity, so high-handed was the proceeding. I said I was sane, but, bidding me good-bye, they departed, leaving me to my fate and Providence. The day again grew late, and about evening, the two physicians again visited me and held another five minutes' conversation, after which the "experts" departed.

"Foolish Water."

A Friend who was traveling on the stage-coach in Kansas on a cold winter day, was offered by one of the passengers a drink of whiskey, which, by the Comanche Indians, is called "Foolish Water." The Friend declined drinking; but four or five other passengers accepted the invitation to drink. At length, under the apparent influence of the "foolish water," the gentleman who carried the bottle suggested that each one should either tell a tale, sing a song, or leave the coach. As the Friend was the oldest one present, he was called on to lead off; and at once told the following anecdote:—

"Maw-way, a prominent Comanche chief, was arrested, with six other Indians, in New Mexico, in 1868, and sent to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. On his return he gave to some of his people the following graphic description of his trip: 'I thought that the white people were taking us North to kill us, and when one of our company was taken sick I was surprised that the soldiers should try to cure him and manifest anxiety about him: but he at length died, and instead of being thrown out to the wolves as I expected, they made a nice box to put him in, and also put his bow and arrows, clothes, and everything he had. He was then buried in the nicest hole that I ever saw dug, and a neat board put at the head and foot of the grave. I began to think that the white people were not quite as bad as I imagined. At length we got to the railroad in the western part of Kansas, where we saw the iron horse hitched to a number of houses, into one of which we were taken, and oh! what a beautiful house it was. I had never seen anything to compare with it before, and we each had a nice, soft seat. We had been there but a short time when the iron horse made a snort, and away it went, pulling all the houses with it. Why, our ponies could not run half so fast as it went, and it did not get tired either; and they only fed it with wood and water. It soon stopped at another white man's village, and so on until we arrived at Leavenworth, where there were so many people, and the land so scarce, that there was not room to build their houses without putting one right up on top of another, sometimes two or three houses high.

"'We were taken into one of the large houses, which was divided into little houses; and then we were taken into the house above, which was also divided into little houses. The streets were full of people, and the houses were full, but where they all come from I cannot tell. I had no idea that there were so many white people, or that they had so many villages; but I know they were there, for I saw them with my own eyes. After we were taken through the houses which were built on top of each other, we were taken into one under it, which was dug in the ground. There was nobody living in this, but there was a large quantity of foolish water there. I noticed that it made white people so foolish to drink it that I was afraid to drink, lest I should get foolish too.'"

Here the Friend stopped talking, and soon afterward, when one of the other gentlemen called for the bottle, the one who had it, said:

"No; it makes white people so foolish to drink whiskey, that I think we had better stop."

No more was drank during the balance of journey.

Maw-way and his companions were sent back to their people in 1869 in charge of a citizen who got intoxicated on the way, when the Indians became disgusted with him, and went on without him to Ft. Sill, and reported themselves to Colonel Grierson as his prisoners, telling him that the man who was in charge of them had drank some "foolish water" and lost his senses. The colonel told them that they had acted better than the white man, and should no longer be regarded as prisoners, but might go to their people.

Here was an instance of some untutored Indians acting more discreetly and with better judgment than many white people, by refraining from intoxicating drink when offered to them. Nearly all men who do business have liquor offered to them, and if they were to act like these Indians, not to partake of the first glass, there would be no danger of being overcome with strong drink, which the Bible says is raging, and wine a mocker.—Olive Leaf.

"For The Friend"

Appointed Meeting at Smithville.

Smithville is one of several New Jersey neighborhoods in which Friends were settled as early as the last quarter of the seventeenth century. It is across the Mullica River from Tuckerton, and is mentioned in Friends' journals with Little and Great Egg Harbor. The location of all the old meeting houses along the shore is not now certain. At Seaville, south of Beesley's Point, one of the oldest is still standing, and on the sandy knoll now occupied by the Methodist meeting-house at Smithville, we can be quite sure there was a Friends' meeting-house for many years prior to 1850. Not unlikely, George Fox stopped here on his journey through Jersey, for some part of his description seems to fix the locality very perfectly. Be that as it may, Friends did not live and worship in the neighborhood for so many years without leaving an impress, and it is comforting now to find well preserved traditions of their integrity of life and of their high spiritual attainments in religion.

When the meeting at Smithville became extinct, Friends gave the property there to the Methodists, and they have since maintained a meeting. It appears that there was an understanding that Friends might have the use of the Methodist house upon occasion, but the general friendliness of attitude of the people makes this easy without any special reference to that obligation. It is likely that during the past thirty years this privilege has not been sought more than twice, upon one occasion about fifteen years ago for a funeral, and now recently for the public meeting, referred to in this. Several Friends had entertained the feeling for two or three years past that such a public meeting should be held in the neighborhood, and one of them in particular who has recently deceased had urged it especially during the last weeks of the Ninth Month. Her death seemed to leave the concern as a legacy upon the heart of a minister with a minute for service along the shore.

Way was easily made for the appointment by the Methodist pastor now in charge, and Sixth-day, Tenth Month 27th, at half-past seven in the evening, was selected as a favorable time. Four Friends, two of them ministers, were driven the six miles from Absecon that evening to keep the appointment.

The shore road is probably one of the oldest highways in the country. It extends with some degree of distinctness the whole length of the Jersey coast, and during the last century it is probable that one would pass at least ten Friends' meeting houses in traversing it. Nearly every one of these is now closed, and in several cases the neglected condition of the grounds is a sad commentary upon the declension of the Society in those parts.

In riding to the Smithville meeting we were disposed to speculate a little upon the probable size and character of the congregation that would meet us there. The neighborhood is not thickly settled, and we finally concluded that we should be satisfied if twenty persons came together. Imagine our surprise then, upon arriving to find the house well filled, at least two hundred people (some estimates made the number four hundred), being in readiness for the opportunity. The Methodist pastor was present, and leading the ministers into the pulpit he addressed a few well chosen words to the congregation. He told them in order for the greatest good from the meeting and best to accomplish the purpose of the Friends, each soul must make an effort to get into communion with the Highest. He then took his seat, and a very solemn covering of worship came over the company. Under the weight of this, authority seemed to be given to the Friend who had appointed the meeting to speak. He reminded them of a circumstance connected with the life of an eminent minister in Philadelphia who had felt a call to hold a meeting in a neighborhood somewhat noted as the centre of a fox-hunting club. It had seemed to human judgment an impracticable thing to get a meeting at their headquarters, and after some effort by interested parties the Friend was put off from attempting it. His faith, however, was not shaken. He felt sure that a way would be made to carry out what to his mind was clearly a Divine requirement. Finally the proprietor of the hotel that had been the headquarters of the club, died, and very unexpectedly information of the funeral to be held came to the Friend, who immediately said, "It is the opportunity I have been looking for." It was an occasion that brought together from far and near just the company that he had been exercised for, and the Gospel stream flowed out to them in a very wonderful manner. It seemed to him that the death of a man had finally been made the necessary occasion of opening the door to this remarkable service.

So in a sense it might be said also that the death of a good woman, a neighbor of theirs, and one whose birthplace stood amongst them, had been made use of to bring about the degree of faith and faithfulness on the visitor's part to appoint that meeting. She had earnestly desired it, and urged it, and had finally named a limit of time for its appointment, which had proved to be the last two weeks in which she would have had any strength at all to attend it. Her earnest desire for their welfare and strength in the Lord might yet descend upon them, and as her death had been used to incite one to faithfulness in appointing a meeting, so it might well be used to incite us all to faith in every word and work of the Lord Jesus.

But there was the death of another to which the holding of this meeting must chiefly be ascribed,—the dying of Him who "tasted death for every man;" and thereby the unspeakable gift through Christ crucified, without whom neither this nor any gathering in true Christian worship could be held. Futile would be this or any other movement among men for salvation, except for the one and the only Name given under heaven and among men whereby we must be saved; and in his name, the witness of his Spirit and power, must we know and follow the steps of our salvation,—a name which stands not in syllables or in wor l, but in power. And so "his name, thro' faith in his name," we were persuaded, had made some of these strong, who were seen and known in their community; and we would that this occasion should have part in baptizing others and us all, "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." So walking in Him their lives would be bearing no uncertain witness, that "we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life."

To these the message was particularly dwelt on in view of a religious awakening which had lately been known among them, "as ye have received the Lord Jesus Christ, even so walk ye in Him." "If ye live by the Spirit, by the Spirit let us also walk." "Walk in the Spirit ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh."

To those that were exhorted to still receive Jesus Christ as Lord, the way of "repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ" was pointed out. The faith in which he is thus received must be kept operative through obedience in the walk with Him to the end. The daily dwelling in his life during the week-day toil, or intercourse, or solitude,—whether at home, afield or on the sea was urged, that his name, through faith in his name, might make and keep them strong.

Some might presume to be satisfied with their first reception of Christ, and the remembrance of a first enthusiasm; but He would not see the desire of his soul and be satisfied, except as they should walk in him the journey through. The path of the justified must be the path of the just, "as a shining light, shining more and more unto the perfect day." And, in short, the burden of the meeting seemed to be the need of daily realizing the language, "For me to live is Christ." The fulness of God's love in all these gifts was then reverted to by the other minister. The gospel stream flowed out toward them in large measure and interested tenderness attended the utterances to the end.

But a fragment of a building cannot be used as a specimen of the whole structure; neither can an abstract of the exercise of a meeting indicate the spirit of its life and impression.

After baptizing offerings of prayer and testimony from the pastor to the remarkable favor and uplifting power of the occasion signs for the dismissal of the meeting were given more than once. so loth did many seem to depart from the covering under which the were held.

By common consent the opportunity was very memorable one. The aisle was lon crowded with men and women patiently waiting for a personal word, and a grasp of the visitor hands. In George Fox's phrase, the peop were "very sweet and tender" and the bapti ing power of a pure ministry was feelingly wi nessed. One remarked as we returned fro the meeting that instrumental and vocal mus in lieu of the solemn silence in which we we held at intervals, would have been felt as violence to the spirit of the occasion, and ha seemed like coming down from the high pla form of privilege upon which celestial mel dies had melted a whole congregation in love.

OBSERVER.

ZIG-ZAGGING.—It is by getting out of t narrow way, or by trying to trim betwe Christ and the world, that so many ma "crooked paths;" and it is by gadding abo after worldly things that they not only ma their ways "crooked," but so jade themselv as at least to weary of the Christian life al gether. They are like the old farmer's d Towser, we read of recently in the story t runs as follows :

"The poor dog is tired out," said Mary, the wagon drove into the yard, and Tows covered with the dust of the road, dropp lolling and panting upon the grass.

"'Tisn't the journey he had to take tha tired him," laughed the farmer. "He's u himself up by zig-zagging from one side of road to the other and 'tending to everyth that didn't concern him. He couldn't pas gate without runnin' through to see what on the other side, nor see a hen anywh along the road without feelin' called on chase her. Every dog that barked star him to barkin', and everything that mo took him out of his way to find out wha was and where it was agoin'. No wonder tired! But you'll find plenty of human be that are travelin' their lives through in that same way. They ain't satisfied with bit of road that's marked out for their feet, but they try to oversee all their ne bor's goin's and doin's, and take charge o end of things that they can't either help hinder. They're like old Towser : it w 'em all out. If they'd follow straight a the Master, and not invent so many e cares for themselves, the way wouldn't be so long nor hard."

Our friends called at the office of the Commissioner of Immigration, and found that their coming had been heralded by telegraph. "We had a free talk for about an hour, were told what was being done, and were impressed with the business-like manner with which the Department was managing its affairs. It is quite apparent that much remains to be done before the new comers can hope to be ready for the winter. At Selkirk we saw some of the Doukhobors, and in this city are others. A party of about 300 start to-night for the neighborhood of Yorkton, and another party leave the following day for the Prince Albert settlement. It seems to us rather hard to start out at this season. We are informed that one car of cornmeal, [the first shipped by the committee, from Iowa] arrived here yesterday."

"There seems to be strong pressure brought against the political party in power, by their opponents, for the bringing of the Doukhobors into the country; much is said against them, in various ways; the object being in large measure for political effect, rather than from hatred for the settlers."

The Preachers of Primitive Christianity.

In the early days of the Christian church every preacher of the gospel was an evangelist, in the real meaning of that, in our time, much abused word. There were no professional teachers nor settled pastors. The flocks were scattered, and even the seventy, who were sent forth, went each man for himself, with no abiding place, with no guaranteed provision for his material wants. He was simply a messenger of righteousness and mercy, having the highest mission on earth, but no human assurance even of his daily bread. He had no place whereon to lay his head, except such as changing circumstances brought about. Yet these were the days of marvellous power, when the Spirit moved upon troubled waters, carrying healing in his wings for the suffering, sorrowful, neglected multitude. Peter had no difficulty in reaching the masses, on the day of Pentecost, nor at any other time. His consecrated associates found the field white for the harvest everywhere. There had been no artificial preparation of any kind, for this wonderful work, the like of which the world had never seen, and which, most strangely, it has never witnessed since.

Plain, uncouth, unlettered, untaught men, whose garments were stained with daily toil, were suddenly called, and they went forward obediently, in supreme faith, working miraculous things, for the benefit of humanity, and in laying broad, deep and lasting the foundations of a new era, one which was to bless mankind forever. Only one amongst them seems to have been earlier taught of men, yet when the pedants of our time, in their flippant way, talk about "Doctor" Luke, the old fashioned Christian is amazed and hurt. It is something new and startling to him that he naturally and justifiably resents. The apostle may be called the "beloved physician," in the language of holy writ, but any other affected title is an affront to Christian common sense. Think of Rev. Dr. Simon Peter. Think of Prof. John. Think of Matthew, James and even Paul, rigged up with all the modern clerical titles, Phd., D. D., LL. D. It all sounds not only grotesque, but utterly sacrilegious.

Yet the average minister of the gospel of to-day is not content without being signalled out for the same worldly honor, that pleases his consuming vanity and separates him from common humanity. It is no wonder that those who preach these days find their task growing harder and harder. It is no wonder that they look with distress upon the decreasing interest in spiritual matters on the part of great numbers of men and even women of all classes. But when the unpretentious, simple hearted, sincere and earnest man of the people comes upon the platform of the church, discarding the artificial barrier called the pulpit, and gets close to the waiting hearers, he quickly reaches their hearts. And when some one who cannot talk much, according to professional clerical idea, but who can relate the every day experiences of human life so that they may be appreciated, in a sympathetic way, this evangelist finds a welcome that ought to impress all concerned most deeply. The lesson is so plain that every one can read it. It has been repeated thousands of times in this country within the past few years.

The simple fact is, nothing is so much needed in the church to-day as a revival of the true methods of presenting the old, old story that first came to the shepherds of Bethlehem, who knew nothing of books, nor of fine raiment, nor social glamour, pretense and folly; who never dreamed of guilded temples of formal worship; who could not have comprehended much of what is called music in the after part of the nineteenth century. . . . The evangelist who is honest and true is, indeed, blessed by God. By his fruit he may be judged, and the church everywhere, and especially the clergy, instead of looking at Him askance, should be admonished by his success, and imitate his direct and simple methods of carrying to the hearts and minds of men the Divine message of warning, entreaty, forgiveness and peace.—The Commonwealth.

ONE might have thought that it was all over with Joseph when he was sent to prison, or with John when he was exiled to Patmos, or with John Bunyan when he was locked up in Bedford jail. They were all put in the place where they could be most useful.—T. L. Cuyler.

Items Concerning the Society.

Benjamin Vail has completed his service within the limits of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, having attended several meetings and visited over fifty families.

James M. Rote, of Millville, Pa., having a minute from Muncy Monthly Meeting for religious service in Haddonfield Quarter, N. J., is looking especially towards the Monthly Meetings held at Moorestown, Mt. Laurel, Evesham and Haddonfield.

Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting was held on Second-day, the 6th instant, at Arch Street. Several ministers from other Quarters were under exercise, spoken or silent, in a covering of good which deepened in life increasingly to the end. The Meeting accepted the recommendation of its committee to attach the membership of Exeter Monthly Meeting to that of Philadelphia, thus discontinuing the holding of the former. The Meetings for Worship at Exeter, Maiden Creek, and Pottstown continue to be held, and are occasion for the spiritual travail and gospel visitation of concerned Friends, whose company in those meetings would be eagerly welcomed.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The monthly statement of the public debt shows a decrease during Tenth Month of $2,276,199, accounted for by an increase in the amount of cash on hand and the increased redemption of national bank notes. The interest bearing debt now amounts to $1,046,040,020.

The prevailing use of electricity has brought about a large increase in fires, owing to crossed wires. Ten years ago there were only sixty-five such fires, and last year there were 958.

A letter of the N. Y. correspondent of the Public Ledger says: "Vice walks openly through the principal streets of the city. Moreover New York has become the home of prize fighting. Two champion fights have been held here this year, besides a large number of minor contests. At the fight on Friday night the Deputy Chief of Police was present throughout, and saw one of the contestants have two of his ribs broken, and the other so damaged that the blood flowed freely, but let the affair go on to a finish, while high officials of the city received the bulletins of the fight, round by round, at the Democratic Club. The boss of the city, Richard Croker, made no concealment of his interest in the encounter. Now there are many good people who say that these things have to be in a great cosmopolitan city like New York. They argue that a big city cannot be governed like a small town, and that a liberal policy must be allowed. Even vice, they say, should be assigned a district, and as for prohibiting the sale of liquor even for one day that is worse than useless. People will fight and gamble, they declare, and there must be a place even for prize fights and gambling. The most that can be done is, to regulate and restrict these evils. There is one thing that is utterly abhorrent to all good people, and that is, laying tribute on these evils of a great city, forcing them to pay liberally for their privileges to the political parties and bosses. That is the greatest evil of all, as wherever it exists it degrades politics to the lowest level."

The Philippine Commissioners have submitted to the President their preliminary report. In it they say: "The Filipinos are not a nation, but a variegated assemblage of different tribes and peoples; and their loyalty is still of the tribal type. The bald fact is that the Filipinos have never had any experience in governing themselves." The report shows that this inability for self-government is due to the old Spanish regime, which gave the Filipinos little or no part in governing themselves.

The first autonomous government of the Filipinos was installed on the 6th instant at Bacolor, on the Island of Negros. General Smith, the United States Military Governor, swore in the Judge of the Supreme Court, and he in turn swore in the civil officers. The elections were held in Negros, Tenth Month 2nd.

There is said to be a shortage of food in Guam, and that Government relief is necessary.

American coal miners are attacking all the miners of other countries how to mine coal by electrical machines. Hauling by mules costs 50 cents a day per mine, while electric locomotives do the work at half that cost.

Two representatives of the Board of Agriculture of Cuba have been in New York city trying to interest financiers and members of the Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants' Association in a plan for the rehabilitation of the planting interests of Cuba. They have written home asking the Board to send here a Commission composed of a delegate from each province of the island in order that the subject may receive a fuller hearing from the Government and financiers of this country. It is arranged that this Commission shall obtain an interview with President McKinley; and the Merchants' Association of New York has promised to extend to it a special welcome in the form of a public reception or dinner. The Chamber of Commerce of Cuba was a Spanish institution, and has gone out of existence with the overthrow of Spanish rule in the island. The Board of Agriculture, however, remains. This organization represents the planters of Cuba, and in the main is composed of Cubans who ardently desire annexation to the United States whenever that can be brought about without too much friction in both countries. In the meantime the planters hope for some readjustment of the sugar tariff as shall serve to revive the chief industry of the island and give greater value to the plantations.

On Tenth Month 30th, the Marconi wireless telegraph was successfully operated. A test at sea showed that over twenty-nine miles of the Atlantic Ocean, over housetops, church spires, towering office buildings, the Marconi electrical ripples successfully carried and dropped messages between two moving warships. The test proved that within a radius of twenty-one miles messages can be transmitted by wireless telegraphy with all the accuracy and precision of an ordinary land line. It also proved that hills, high buildings, wires and wind currents do not break the force of the electrical waves, and do not interfere in the slightest degree with the transmission of messages. General Greely says that as a means of connecting the islands of the West Indies, Hawaii and the Philippines, which are in the range of its action, wireless telegraphy should prove of value.

The most important discovery made by the Harriman scientific party in Alaska was that the glaciers are receding.

The reason why the Great Salt Lake in Utah is growing smaller, according to Professor James E. Talmage, is that the volume of water from its four tributary rivers is being more and more diverted by irrigation.

A local Milwaukee paper says the city is soon to be the centre of the automobile industry in the United States. A man from Iowa has invented a machine weighing not more than seventy-five pounds, which can be attached to any vehicle now drawn by a horse, and is capable of reaching a speed of fifty miles an hour. It is said a stock company backed by $1,000,000 is soon to be formed in that city to manufacture the machine, and that a man well known throughout the United States will be at the head of the concern.

Frost on the lower Mississippi Valley has resulted in a general raising of the yellow fever quarantine against New Orleans. The Texas authorities have lifted the freight quarantine against New Orleans, but it is continued against passengers.

General White, commanding the British forces at Ladysmith, reports that on Tenth Month 30th the Royal Irish Fusileers, No. 10 Mountain Battery, and the Gloucestershire Regiment, were surrounded in the hills by the Boers, and after losing heavily were obliged to capitulate. Gen. White attributes the result largely to the stampede of the mule battery with the British ammunition. The War Office in London officially announces that the Boers have occupied Colenso, south of Ladysmith, which the British garrison evacuated. The officials on the 6th instant said they had no further news regarding the military situation in Natal. They could not say whether the railroad to Ladysmith was intact, but admitted that Ladysmith is now completely surrounded. The situation at Ladysmith practically remains unchanged.

The occurrence of French names like Joubert among the Boers is explained by the fact that many Huguenots went to the Cape of Good Hope while it was still a Dutch colony, and there become prosperous and prominent. The descendants of many of these Huguenots may be found in the Transvaal to-day, and are quite as Dutch in all their ways as the other Boers.

A Liberty for Bondage.

A large amount of protestation about liberty is done by those who are having their eye on certain forms of the bondage of sin which they crave liberty to enter into.

But absolute liberty among the people would quickly be found a reign of terror, and would soon open all eyes to the truth that the greatest liberty of the greatest number requires the sacrifice of a share of each one's personal freedom, that liberty may be made possible as regulated by law.

In the church we know of no liberty of the Spirit except as it is a liberty in and under the Spirit. When it ceases to abide there and to move only as moved thereby, the so-called liberty of the spirit is made to mean the liberty of our own spirits. This is too often confounded with that of the Holy Spirit.

The most vigorous promisers of liberty in our religious Society, and the wide-spread claimants of it, seem to have combined to become servants of a bondage which is yearly tightening the grip of a one-man leadership and stated performances for worship, closer and closer.

Where understandings are settled beforehand in large yearly meetings for worship as to who on the platform are the ones to be heard from, and the incubus of pre-arrangement thus stifles the old-time freedom of the Spirit in gospel ministry, our boasted liberty of gifts seems to mean liberty to suppress them.

Where the spring of the ministry, as it is given to open here and there among its worshippers, is dried up or choked down by the substitution of a stated pastor; and where, if any one has an exhortation in the Spirit, the period is pre-empted by the set occurrence of words for prayer or the lesson to be read; or where the prerogative of deciding when the Spirit of praise is to arise is surrendered to a dictator that he may prescribe and impose the words to be sung, is there not a return to the bondage from which Friends were once emancipated? The liberty of the spirit so long contended for, is getting found out to be such monopoly, and such repression of the spiritual gifts of the many. This will cause a dearth of ministers from the true Source of supply, and where it is held that preaching must be contracted for, will force the alternative of looking for the college-made kind.

So, and in many other particulars, the bondage is, as we hear it confessed by witnesses over wide areas, sensibly covering those under our name. The liberty of the spirit has largely meant license of the creature; and next, after general enthusiasm has subsided, license of a preacher. Because, when once the safe-guards of our original liberty under the Spirit are cast aside, the sequel to liberty for license is found a liberty for bondage.

Such a state of things in many quarters has been developed as to raise a concern among thoughtful minds to institute a united Discipline for all the Yearly Meetings, and such code of regulations is well nigh completion, to be offered to several Yearly Meetings for their general union under it. We know not its provisions, but however wisely they may be drawn up, it seems safe to say that Friends in order to be united into one body must be united in the one Spirit, and except as they are held in the unity of the Spirit, no bond of peace will be found in any ecclesiastical constitution. If Christ were only waited on in all things to be Head over all things to his Church, his Spirit as the unwritten but ever witnessed constitution of his Church would transcend the virtue of any constitution written in the letter. To this one safe-guard of all true union and unity we would that those under our name should everywhere recur, the immediate witness of his Spirit. "It is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is Truth." And they who are united to the one witness of the living Christ are united to each other, and He becomes Constitution enough for all the tribes of our religious Society, while the local conditions of each may require their special rules of Discipline under Him as Head over all. It is a confession of the weakness both of a disintegrating liberty and a disintegrating bondage that such an outward ecclesiastical bond seems sought for. The headship of Christ livingly abode under in all would not only supersede that which is proposed, but render much of the discipline already written, uncalled for.

Too many professed Christians are the creatures of circumstances and conditions. They go up and down with the tide: to-day they are happy, to-morrow they are in the dumps. When business thrives, they are great believers in Providence; when times become hard and income falls off, their faith goes out like a candle under an air-pump. In revival seasons they can sing and pray, and perhaps exhort with a glib tongue; when the surrounding atmosphere cools down, they are as lukewarm as ever. The reason is that they live on circumstances, and do not live on Christ.—T. L. Cuyler.

"For The Friend"

A Recent Visit to the Doukhobors.

Dr. William Saunders, who is in charge of the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa, Canada, as head of the Agricultural Department of the Dominion, has recently visited the Doukhobors in their new settlements, and as his testimony is impartial and reliable, we quote at some length from a letter to James T. Shinn, of Philadelphia, dated Tenth Month, 8th, 1899:

"I wanted you to know how greatly these long-suffering people appreciate the kindness which has been shown them, not only by the Canadian Government and people, but also by the generous aid sent by the good Friends in Philadelphia and England.

"I went to this district, partly to see the country, and partly to see how far I could make our own agricultural work beneficial to these people, and I can now see many ways in which I can help them, and shall be glad to do all that is in my power to further their interests, and I know that the Canadian people will be willing to sanction any reasonable expenditure sufficient to keep these worthy people from suffering. They do not, however, ask for help, and in the pleasure they feel in being free from persecution they seem happy and contented with the most frugal diet. I feel sure that in a very few years they will become a prosperous community, and henceforth live happily in the enjoyment of freedom.

"On Sunday I made the necessary arrangements for a start northwards. On Monday morning we took provisions for ourselves and horses for three days, a large fur robe and a heavy pair of blankets so that we might be able to sleep out if necessary. I also got an order for an interpreter, who lives fifteen miles out on the trail, and is employed by the government, to go with us to the first two villages, and after that we were to be our own interpreters and get along as best we might, with odd words and pantomime.

"The first village we (that is my driver Jack and myself, with the interpreter) stopped at, was about thirty miles from Yorkton, and the second about forty miles; as it was now getting dusk, when we reached the second village, I thought at first we would spend the night with the Doukhobors, but after seeing the conditions of this village I reconsidered the matter.

"This camp has, as yet, but few houses, and each house is a single room used for all purposes, eating, cooking and sleeping. In the first house visited, we found about forty people in all, mostly women and children. In the next house they were less numerous, about twenty-five in all. In the third, there are five horses at one end, and about a dozen, more or less, of children at the other. The larger building would be, I think, about 25x35, the smaller one about 20x30.

"The furniture in the Doukhobor houses is home-made, and consists of a few stools and one or two benches. The beds are made with a continuous row of poplar poles, arranged along both sides of the room about two feet from the floor: on these some hay is laid, and on the hay a thick piece of coarse felt, and on the felt such bed clothes as are available. In the buildings densely populated, a second tier of beds is built. The people lie with their heads to the wall and their feet out. I thought the prospects very poor of either a quiet or comfortable night at either of these places, so I talked the matter over with Jack, the driver, and we finally concluded to push on to Fort Pelly, which was eleven miles distant, leaving our interpreter with the Doukhobors. It was cloudy and very dark, so that we were often unable to see the horses' heads, but we kept the trail without any mishap, and about 11 P. M. we approached the ford of the Assiniboine River. I never liked fording a river in the dark, but Jack had been over this trail a number of times, and so we started, and in a few minutes we were over, and in ten or fifteen minutes more we were at the fort. The factor, Mr. McBeth, had gone to bed, but we roused him up, and got him to take us in. We had driven sixty miles that day, much of it over a rough trail, and being tired, I was soon asleep.

"At 8:30 next morning, we were ready for a fresh start. About 11 we passed through one or two other Doukhobor camps, but did not find any one with whom we could communicate. So we pushed further on, and forded the Swan River, over the roughest ford I ever saw, the bottom being made up of a succession of big boulders, which threatened every moment to upset our rig and tumble us into the very rapid stream. We got safely over, after which a drive of two or three miles brought us to another village, where we knew there lived a Doukhobor boy, who could speak some English—Fred Ivan by name. His father, Ivan Ivan, (who left Russia some months before the general exodus took place, and resided at Purleigh, near London, where he learned some English, and in part, adopted their ways of living) is the chief man in his village. I found Fred to be a very bright boy (I should think) fourteen or fifteen years of age. He was two months in Winnipeg last winter, and learned what English he knows while there. His sister, some two or three years younger, also spoke some English. The father and mother are very nice people, and very hospitable, as far as it is possible for them to show hospitality. Before I had quite exhausted Fred Ivan's stock of English, a Russian young lady appeared on the scene, Miss Weletchkina, who is a physician, a graduate of the University at Berne, Switzerland. She spoke English fairly well, and from her I learned much of the condition of the people. They are all vegetarians, and as far as I could learn, none of them will eat any meat.

"Their fare, at present, is very meagre. Dry bread made from the cheapest grade of flour, soup made of flour and water, with cabbage, beets and onions, was, as far as I could find out, the fare of most of the people, but in some instances they had potatoes.

"I did not find butter, cheese or eggs in any of the settlements, but I did not hear a word of complaint. I think Ivan Ivan's settlement is, perhaps, about as well off as most of the villages, and there I got fuller particulars from the nice little lady, the Russian doctor, than I could get elsewhere. In that community there were ninety souls—seventeen of the men were away working on the railways, and among farmers, earning from $1.25 to $1.50 per day. These men have remitted to their several v lages from $20 to $25 a month each, and fr the money thus earned, a stock of flour is bei laid in, sufficient for winter. They also b such supplies as they need in building th houses, such as windows, hinges for doors, a more or less lumber. In Ivan Ivan's villa there are four horses and a colt, and one co I think horses enough to furnish one for ea family there. I inquired from Mrs. Ivan Iv as to the share of their family of the milk this cow, and was told that it was a small co not giving much milk, and that for their fa ily of seven, five children and themselves, th had a teacupful night and morning. Of fow they had one hen and one cock, so I did not quire further as to the supply of fresh eg They seemed very careful of such animals they have, but they must have more befe long. They have got a good deal of land broke about a hundred acres at Ivan Ivan's villa As the men were most of them absent, and t horses were engaged in bringing in suppl most of the time, and about one journey Yorkton, ninety miles, and return ninety mil is all they can do in a week, the women unde took to do most of the plowing. It took use the language in which it was given m 'seven pairs' of women to each plow. I quired how much of the hundred acres I sa had been plowed by the women and I was t that they had done the larger part of it. T land is good, but it will not be in very go shape for seeding next spring, still I have doubt they will get a fair crop from it. . . . The houses they are building are warm a comfortable, and they have plenty of wood f fuel on their lands. They will also, I think, g in a fair supply of potatoes. The women a going out to work, to help settlers wherev there are settlers within twenty miles of th villages, and it will take a good deal of food supply 5,000 people, which is about the nu ber of Doukhobors in that part of the counti

"They seem very contented, and I did n hear a word of complaint, and they all seem busy doing something. I left that settleme on Tuesday afternoon and went north and ea which led us near some of the other villag but having no interpreter, I did not thin could gain much further information, besi Miss Weletchkina had promised to write and give me particulars regar ling all the otl villages. I learned from her that she v much in need of medical supplies, and on rea ing Winnipeg yesterday, I reported this m to the proper authorities, and made arran ments to have the necessary supplies sent without delay. It seems much more diffic to help a community of vegetarians in t country than a community of meat eaters. I think they would prefer to starve than meat. They are just the sort of stuff of wh the martyrs are made. It would take too l to tell the story of our adventures after l ing Ivan Ivan's, but early Wednesday af noon we reached a little frontier town in Dauphin district, tired and hungry, as we left everything we could leave behind us, the Doukhobors. The latter part of the j ney was very rough, over new trails throu wooded country, where the trees were not very close to the ground, the stumps being a foot or so high, and so thick that it was possible, in driving, to avoid more than pa em. Although pitched about in every direc-

For "THE FRIEND."

Robert Proud, in his History of Pennsylvania, remarks: "In this year, 1685, the Quakers, in their Yearly Meeting, at Burlington, in West Jersey, took additional measures to prevent all persons in their Society from selling strong liquors to the Indians. About the same time, by particular appointment, they also had a religious meeting with them, as they frequently had before, to inform and instruct them in the principles of Christianity, and the practice of a true Christian life.

"The Indians generally heard patiently what was said to them on this subject, and seemed affected with it, for a time; but, for the most part, it appeared to make no very durable impression on their minds for the proper regulation of their passions and appetites, which, at least, too generally seemed to prevail over convictions of this nature and their better knowledge.

"Divers preachers of this religious society from abroad often had meetings, and serious discourse with them for this purpose, as well as those who had settled in the country, particularly Samuel Jennings, Thomas Olive, William Penn and others, who from time to time, labored to inculcate into them a just sense of the benefit of a Christian life and conduct."

Samuel Smith, an esteemed member of our religious Society, in his history of New Jersey, first published in 1765, in describing the Indians of that province, bears a similar testimony, as follows: "Very little can be said as to their religion; much pains were taken by the early Christian settlers, and frequently since, to inform their judgments respecting the use and benefit of the Christian revelation and to fix restraints, but generally with unpromising success, though instances have now and then happened to the contrary."*

Thomas Story, in his journeys in this country, had religious opportunities with the Indians on several occasions, and gives in his Journal the following interesting remarks upon their capacity for receiving religious impressions:

"As to the conversion of the Indians to the Truth. I believe the Lord will call them after the power of anti-Christ is overthrown; but it seems to me that learning, or the historical part of religion, or their own language, which is very barren of pertinent words, will not be much instrumental in it; but the word of Life, whose Divine and life-giving intellectual speech is more certainly known in the mind, will tender their hearts in a silent state and retirement, by means of some instruments that the Lord will raise up and qualify for that purpose; who shall not confound them with a long fruitless history of needless things. But when the Lord shall send forth his Word, "The Light of the Gentiles," the quickening Spirit of Jesus, into and upon any of them in holy silence or in prayer, their minds shall be directed to the spirit Himself, as the present object of their faith, obedience and love, and author of their present joy and salvation; and so, believing in the light, shall become children of that light and day of God, and heirs of eternal life in Him. And then the histories in the Bible, the prophecies of the prophets of God, and the fulfilling of them; the evangelical account of the conception, birth, life, doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, ascension, glorification, mediation, intercession and judgment of Him, who is the substance of all, and that "true light which lighteth every man which cometh into the world," will be the more clearly received by the Indians when the Almighty shall think fit to acquaint them therewith."

If the preaching the gospel by word of mouth thus appears to have produced but little impression upon the natives of this country, there is ample evidence that they have closely watched the conduct and example of the whites around them, and that they have been far more readily influenced by their deeds than by their words.

It is a cause of regret that in the first purchase of land from the Indians by the representatives of William Penn intoxicating liquors were furnished among the articles given them in the payment. It cannot, however, be supposed it was with his approval, as it was done previous to his arrival in this country, and by his deputy, William Markham, who, probably knowing the desires of the Indians for such liquors, had no scruples in supplying what might have been considered a moderate allowance to them on such an occasion.

It is worthy of note, however, that soon after his arrival in this country, William Penn had a law enacted prohibiting the sale of liquors to the Indians, and that in the ten purchases of land made by him personally during his first visit to this colony, namely from Sixth Month, 1682, to Eighth Month, 1684, no such liquors are mentioned as among the articles given them, excepting that on one occasion four bottles of cider are specified as a part of the consideration.

Among the evidences of William Penn's continued desire for their welfare, is the following entry upon the minutes of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, held First Month, 29th, 1700, during his second and last visit to this country:

"Our dear friend, the Governor, having laid before this meeting a concern that hath lain upon his mind for some time, concerning the negroes and Indians, that Friends ought to be very careful in discharging a good conscience toward them in all respects, but more especially for the good of their souls, and that they might as frequent as may be, come to meetings on First days. Upon consideration whereof, this meeting concludes to appoint a meeting for the negroes to be kept once a month. . . And it further agreed that when the Indians come to town some Friends be appointed to speak with them, in order to get a meeting amongst them. In order whereto our Governor is willing to speak to them, and that if they assent thereto, Friends get interpreters and meet with them, which also the Governor takes care of. Several among Friends that can speak Indian well (as we are informed) are John Stevens at Radnor, Henry Worley, Will-

* It is a noteworthy fact that the friendly feeling which existed between the first settlers of New Jersey, many of whom were Friends and the Indians, was never interrupted by war. iam Biles, Jr., Derby school master, and Ann Ayers, of Chester County."

The late Dr. Daniel G. Brinton, in an exhaustive work on "The Lenape and Their Legends,"† states that it was with the Unamis and Unalachtigos, sub-tribes of the Delawares, that William Penn dealt for the land ceded to him in 1682. Their territory was on the west side of the Delaware River, extending from the Lehigh southwards. The term Unami, he states, means "people down the river," and Unalachtigos "people who live near the ocean." The third sub-tribe were the Minsi, Munsies or Minisinks or "mountaineers," living in the mountainous region along the Delaware north of its junction with the Lehigh, but who are believed to have also occupied a considerable portion of New Jersey.

The writings of William Penn contain frequent references to the natives of this country, and his description of them in his letter to the Free Society of Traders residing in London, portrays their character in a very interesting and graphic manner. (Friend's Library Vol. 5, p. 180.) The journals of John Richardson, Thomas Chalkley and Thomas Story contain frequent allusions to them, and to events connected with the early history of Pennsylvania.

A minute of the Yearly Meeting in 1722 thus alludes to the kindness accompanying the early intercourse between Friends and the Indians, and their concern that none under our name should be parties to the sale to them of intoxicating drink, a traffic which from the first intercourse of the white people with the Indians has been productive of the greatest evils.

"When way was made for our worthy Friends, the proprietors and owners of lands in these provinces, to make their first settlements, it pleased Almighty God by his overruling Providence to influence the native Indians so as to make them very helpful and serviceable to those early settlers before they could raise stock or provisions to sustain themselves and families; and it being soon observed that those people when they got rum, or other strong liquors, set no bounds to themselves, but were apt to be abusive and sometimes destroyed one another, there came a religious care and concern upon Friends both in their meetings and Legislature to prevent those abuses; nevertheless, some people preferring their filthy lucre before the common good, continued in this evil practice, so that our Yearly Meeting held in Philadelphia in the year 1687, testified "that the practice of selling rum or other strong liquors to the Indians, directly or indirectly, or exchanging the same for any goods or merchandise to them [considering the abuse they make of it] is a thing displeasing to the Lord, a dishonor to Truth, and a grief to all good people," and although this testimony hath since been renewed by several Yearly Meetings, it is yet too notorious that the same hath not been duly observed by some persons; and therefore it has become the weighty concern of this meeting earnestly to recommend the said testimony to the strict observance of all Friends, and when any under our profession shall act contrary thereto, let them be speedily dealt with and censured for such their evil practice."

†In this volume Dr. Brinton bears testimony to the friendly aid extended by these Indians to the first settlers as follows: "My ancestor William Brinton, arrived in the fall of 1684, and with his wife and children, immediately took possession of a grant in the unbroken wilderness, about twenty miles from Philadelphia. A severe winter set in; their food supply was exhausted, and they would probably have perished but for the assistance of some neighboring lodges of Lenape, who provided them with food and shelter. It is therefore a debt of gratitude which I owe to this nation to gather its legends, its language, and its memories, so that they,

"in books recorded
May, like hoarded
Household words, no more depart."

A WONDERFUL MACHINE.—"A watch," says a Boston watchmaker, "is the smallest, most delicate machine that was ever constructed of the same number of parts. About one hundred and seventy-five pieces of metal enter into its construction, and upward of twenty-four hundred separate operations are comprised in its manufacture. Some of the facts connected with the performance are simply incredible, when considered in total. A blacksmith strikes several thousand blows on his anvil in a day, and is right glad when Sunday comes around; but the roller jewel of a watch makes every day, and day after day, 432,000 impacts against the fork, or 157,680,000 blows in a year without stop or rest, or 3,153,600,000 in the short space of twenty years. These figures are beyond the grasp of our feeble intellects; but the marvel does not stop here. It has been estimated that the power that moves the watch is equivalent to only four times the force used in a flea's jump; consequently it might be called a four flea-power. One horse-power would suffice to run 270,000,000 watches. Now the balance-wheel of a watch is moved by this four flea-power one and forty-three one-hundredths inches with each vibration—three thousand five hundred and fifty-eight and three-quarters miles continuously, in one year. It doesn't take a large can of oil to lubricate the machine on its thirty-five-hundred-mile 'run.' It requires one-tenth of a drop of oil the entire watch for a year's service. But it has great need of that one-tenth of a drop. If you would preserve the time-keeping qualities of your watch, you should take it to a competent watch-maker once every eighteen months."

But with all the marvelous mechanism of a watch it is a small affair compared with the mind that contrived it, the hand that constructed it, and the eye that superintended the process.

THE JOY OF THE LORD.—To have the joy of the Lord we do not need to make long and expensive journeys to far off conventions. We do not need to spend our money for the great luxuries of the palaces and costly equipage. The poor have it in their homes, often in great fulness. In their godly and contented lives they have a peace and satisfaction of soul that may not be found in kings' palaces. They have not the means or the time to spend attending the annual conventions, so attractive to many. But they have the sweet felicity of communion with God in the home circle and the home church, undisturbed by the bustle and excitement of the convention life. The joy of the Lord more than compensates for all there is in a junketing trip, either to lake or mountain pleasure resort, for religious services. —The Christian Instructor.

My Experience in a Mad-house.

I had about decided that I would have another night's sojourn in the prison, when I was called and introduced to two "strangers," who informed me that they would take me to a "sanitarium," as I needed rest. I told them I needed a change of quarters, as I felt all stiff from my confinement, and further said, asking: "Do you mean to take me away from here as an insane man?" They looked at each other significantly, one of the men answering in a patronizing tone that they were simply obeying orders. On the way to the depot, after quite a conversation, one said to the other, "He appears to be all right." We boarded the train, and finally I asked them if they were taking me to Dixmont (insane department) of the Western Pennsylvania Hospital. At first they evaded the question, but finally they acknowledged that that was my destination. Before due time we reached the point, and even through gas light, I could see that the surroundings of the institution are quite imposing and picturesque. Beautiful shade trees surround the palatial-looking buildings, and on entering safely the impression is rather entrancing; the wide corridors, large parlors, and the elegant appointments of the first floor are very attractive and inviting. The preliminaries of the usual order of the business of the commitment having been adjusted, the two men bid me good-bye, and I was given in charge of a keeper, a young man whom I knew in a business way; he was surprised to see me. He led me to an upper ward, and, upon request, I was permitted to have a bath; then was I taken to a ward, which was to afford me the "comforts of home." I found myself in a large room containing 30 cots in the company of men, insane men, and was directly learned upon asking my keeper why they would have me here, and not give me a quiet room, as I understood I was to be "well treated." The poor man felt real sorry for me, I believe. He said that the rule of the Institution is that all new patients must spend some time in this ward, as this was the "incurable ward."

The kind reader can imagine my amazement—that I was to be an inmate of an insane asylum—in the "incurable ward," among "incurable patients," the "chronic insane," the "maniatic," the demented, afflicted with all sorts of vagaries, hallucinations and aberrations of the mind. Let the kind reader pause with me for a moment. I was to be a "forced inmate" (as stated, I asked for a single room) in the department of the "mad-house," in one room with all these unfortunate men. For a moment I was beside myself; oh, what a fear overcame me; I listened to the filthy and what hellish ejaculations, what fiendish bursts of glee or of hysterical convulsions. The calamities of hell appear to be gathered under the roof of an insane asylum, and yet people say, there is no hell. And here I was to stay the night—how can I do that? I felt a rush of feeling—will I go mad? Can any human being endure such trials, this humiliation? What is to be done? How can I survive the night? The keeper showed me my cot and left me to it. I knew that I was passing through a fiery trial, and experience that was beyond the power of language for me to describe. I needed help, strength—oh my Lord. Pre-ne vividness, the spiritual fervor of my itation brought to my soul a blessed quiet-, but not much sleep. The "inmates" of ward would break out in all sorts of startshrieks, according to the nature of their tion, so I quietly watched and prayed for dawn of the morning. The scene is very indeed, human souls in such a state of ab-tion of mind and mental confusion, stupor delusion. I breakfasted in one of the din-rooms with a company of the inmates; appetite was, however, much better than , some of the men were gluttons and vorais.

'e were taken out for "exercise" on a bridge which connects with the main corridors and which is an affair built of iron girders, and now I had the opportunity of seeing some of the other patients, queer and peculiar subjects indeed. One German blasphemed like a trooper, and crowed like a rooster, and he looked as if he was a vehicle of a legion of demons.

Then the physicians made their rounds and I met Dr. Hutchinson, the genial superintendent of the Institution.

Owing to my "connection" and being acquainted with the "business house" of my brother, the doctor inquired what I was sent out for. I gave him my assurance that I did not know exactly myself; he promised to see me again. I requested earnestly to be given a change of quarters, but was again put among the "incurables" for another night of distressing experiences. I was told that patients must remain among the incurables, as this develops their true condition, and the phase of insanity is thus definitely diagnosed. I am quite sure that if ordinary people with a tendency to nervousness were to be subjected to a similar experience they would go stark mad; there is no doubt about that. Fortunately the grace of God enabled me with fortitude to endure this horrible pit. There was no special "development" in my "condition" and so I was transferred the third day to one of the regular better-class wards, which contain single rooms, in which patients are locked at bedtime. Whilst the Institution, no doubt, is as well managed as any of the kind—it being a Pittsburg affair, and Pittsburg is slow in nothing, as my own experience proved—it is intended for insane people, and I submitted to all the rules and regulations, some of which are, at least in practice, crude and unclean.

By way of illustration. On Friday or Saturday is "bath" day. The men of a ward all strip, two tubs of water are drawn and the first one has the clean water. Those who follow a certain number must wash in the same water, and I noticed that most all were sane enough to wish for a first chance. It was the most disagreeable experience outside of the first two nights. The "bill of fare" is wholesome, the men have tremendous appetites, but seem to get enough. I ate sparsely, but my neighbor was anxious to eat all I would leave. I spent my time in the study of the Bible and other religious books there, and gladly joined in the afternoon outing, which is given frequently to those who are not dangerous.

(To be concluded.)

THE MANNERS OF GOD'S FAMILY.—The following from the Youth's Instructor reminds us of the testimony of William Penn concerning George Fox, that he was "courteous beyond all the forms of breeding:"—Did you ever think of it that true Christianity in the heart is what makes good manners? Of course there may be the superficial culture and polish of cultivated society without a Christian life, or even a profession of it. Just so there may be a profession of Christianity by those whose daily lives are examples of vulgar, boorish, unchristian manners. Of the two it may be quite possible that those who make no profession of religion, and yet, though with insufficient understanding of its deep meaning, live out the golden rule, are nearer to the kingdom of heaven. When those who have never known the truths of religion, and yet have lived kindly, courteous, charitable lives among their fellows, understand and accept the message of the gospel, they have not so difficult a task to perform in conforming their lives to the teachings of the Master as have those who have known and claimed to accept those teachings, and yet have always lived contrary to them.

"Whatever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," is the keynote of good manners. These are the words of the Master. Those who do not live up to them are failing to obey Him, and neglecting to follow his example in the plainest lesson of his life among men. These words do not have reference alone to great deeds of self-sacrifice, for the opportunities for such come rarely, but rather much more to the little thoughtful kindnesses and courtesies which we have continual need to show to those about us. God is love; that heart in which He dwells will overflow with his presence. Where God is not, there will be no love; and his absence from the heart will be apparent to all, because it sheds forth no love.

Then when God occupies the whole heart, his love will, like a sweet perfume, pervade the whole man, the whole house, the whole life, and that person will be like the candle which is not set under a bushel, but lights the house, and spreads the light far abroad through the windows.

Child Study—No. 7.

TRAINING-MORAL DEVELOPMENT.

Childhood is the period of plasticity. It is the parent's opportunity to build up character.

The mind of a little child is not a blank sheet of paper, neither is it an organ with which to reason and judge. In him we find an accumulation of the instincts of the race, together with the peculiar tendencies of his individual ancestors. There is only one best way for us successfully to develop the desirable tendencies, and dwarf the undesirable, and that is to train the child's will to do this necessary work for him. The key to the child's will is love and mutual respect.

Never to give a reason, but to exact "instantaneous obedience," or always to give a reason, and to expect the child to understand it, are both considered obsolete methods. "Parental authority has no other origin than the actual interests of the children."

The duty of parents is to try to understand their children, and then quietly, but firmly, to train the little child to choose the right every time a choice between right and wrong presents itself. This is the ideal way. To do it successfully requires love and patience, and often a knowledge of race development, human nature and divine laws, which few possess. For this lack we are not condemned. We too, like our children, are made up of many short comings, of which we are painfully conscious. They may be a legacy to us along with other better things, from our honored, forceful, pious ancestors, perhaps many generations back. What we can do is to try to study our problem.

It is not sufficient to read what the wise write—we must think for ourselves, and adapt what we learn from books, to our own individual cases. We may have poor material to work with, both in ourselves and in our children, but it is only by working conscientiously and intelligently with what we have, and praying for the Divine blessing, that we can get the best results out of it.

Every one should distinguish between those acts which are wrong and those which are inopportune. Children very properly, are not in sympathy with many of the conventionalities of modern life, and rebel at what seem to them useless demands. If you go to the heart of the child you will usually find more truth, love, faith and honesty than you will find in its parent. Common sense training is quite consistent with great liberty, nevertheless as Helen Winterburn says, in effect,—the parent who has the courage to follow the new methods of training will often have to feel that in point of acceptance the self-reliant child, must give place to the repressed one, so that it will require constantly keeping in mind the ultimate result, in order to persist in a course which is, in its early stages, not flattering to one's egotism.

Children often feel that their parents have no ability and make no effort, to look at their interests from the child's standpoint. Too often there is a great lack of open, frank discussion. There are plenty of people, who think that in the presence of grown folks, children should only listen and learn: that their opinions are of no value and also of no interest. What happens?—the children retire to the kitchen or some convenient loafing ground to spend their leisure with people who will give them a chance to feel on an equality and talk if they want to. Their judgments are thus formed by the least intelligent of their adult associates, and in later life the parents are broken hearted over the barrier which has grown up between them and their children.

I am sure no one approves of the opposite extreme, which results just as disastrously:—that children should monopolize the conversation or be continually demanding attention. A child should, and soon does, if taught, recognize that there are times when it is allowable to talk freely, and other times, especially when guests are present, when it is polite, because pleasure giving, for the children not to join in the conversation. If, moreover, the children are allowed to ask questions or to express opinions, afterwards they will listen with very great interest to the wisdom, or foolishness, of their elders.

Intelligent parents see their children as men and women of the near future. If the companionship is to be helpful to each member of the family, reason, judgment, individuality, independence and broad mindedness must be cultivated. This cannot be secured under a system of repression.

Children do not resent the balance of power being in the hands of their parents; in fact they prefer that it should be so, but they know that they must be allowed freedom, if they are to grow in strength and excellence of character.

People are beginning to see that the problems which always present themselves in every family, are the natural means for developing in the children of the family, a capacity to reason carefully and to judge wisely. Not that severe trials or complex problems should burden unduly their young hearts, or that prosperity should puff them up, but that a share of the living family interests should be theirs, to fit them to meet similar experiences in later life. If children see that these questions are met calmly and wisely by their parents, that the one effort is to know the truth or to discover the best way, it cannot help elevating the characters of the children. When there is a difference of opinion, if individual preferences are held in abeyance by the grown folks, and an earnest effort made to decide upon what is right, any personal element of antagonism necessarily fades away and family harmony is maintained, although the circumstances may have been very trying.

Children's morals in moral families will usually develop normally, without undue looking after—providing the intimacy which I have tried to depict exists between parents and children. There may be a period when the child's imagination will obscure truth. It is often the case, but a parent who understands the child will gently guide it through this experience.

In thinking of each possible moral deviation, the subject of training seems wholly and best promoted by parents having a correct understanding of child nature and lofty ideals for themselves as well as for their children. We train and watch over our children not for selfish ends, but for the uplifting of humanity. Knowing full well the infinitesimal influence of each individual among the millions of people and through the ages of time, nevertheless, each one who helps to understand and live according to the Divine will, does his little toward the coming of the ideal future.

Perhaps one chief thing to be emphasized to-day among all classes is sympathetic broad-mindedness, an ability to look through the eyes of other people and to see what they see. There is a real value in that concentration of effort which is so narrow that it is bound to accomplish whatever is undertaken, but with success, should live an honest appreciation of the equal value of another's work. There is infinite variety in nature. The warm sun seems to enjoy destroying the beautiful results of the snow king. Why should there not be a similar apparent antagonism in human experience. The fact is, no human being catches more than a glimpse of the whole truth. But it is an imperative Divine command that each should be faithful to the truth which he sees. Each should also value his neighbor's part as equal to his own. The reformer should know why the vicious are vicious before he attempts to reform them; the employer should feel as the employée and act accordingly; the rich should picture the feelings of those who know grim want; and the parent should feel the joys and responsibilities which his children feel.

The judgment of broadminded people is always respected. Children know they will get justice, and enjoy talking over their interests with their parents. This element of broad-minded, frank, mutual respect with lofty Christian ideals, leading children to feel their dependence upon Divine favor and their responsibility to use every talent for humanity, will cover all the training in manners and morals which a parent need be anxious about.

Two books have been written lately, by Helen Winterburn,—"From the Child's Standpoint" and "Nursery Ethics." A reviewer says appropriately of one, but it is equally true of both.—"Any parent who would not be benefited by this book has either attained to perfection beyond the reach of grace."

Sight for One Born Blind.

few days ago Alberta McKinne looked out e windows of the "suggestion room" at ye and Ear Infirmary and burst into tears. patients have looked from the windows e infirmary and shed tears caused by suf-g. But she wept for pure joy, and she ed God and Dr. Holt alternately. Small er that she did, for upon her has been ght a truly modern miracle. To one blind birth, the achievements of modern medi-ience have given the sight that for twenty-years has been denied her.

berta McKinne belongs in Rockland, and as born blind. Over each eye a congenital act obscured the vision. She lived with ves who clothed and fed her. One day a ger saw her and looked at her eyes. He ner that he believed if she would go to ye and Ear Infirmary an operation might erformed that would enable her to see. eighbors scoffed. It was ridiculous. But found lodgment in her breast, and her one ght was to come to Portland. She was here for treatment.

s a delicate and peculiar operation that olt performed upon her when he removed ongenital cataracts. It is an operation is usually unsatisfactory. A white sub-e, which was about the color of milk and e consistency of butter, was spread over pupil. It could not be removed by cutting like a hard substance. Instead it had to rred up, so to speak, and then the doctor trusted in a great measure to absorption to remove it.

For fourteen weeks the patient has been at the infirmary. The operation has been performed by easy stages for the purpose of watching and studying each change. Little by little the milky cataracts disappeared until now but a small white speck remains on each eye, and it is thought that these will disappear in time. In all probability another slight operation will be performed to correct a slight crossed effect that appears in the restored organs.

When the final operation was performed the eyes were bandaged and carefully kept from the light for several days. When they were strong enough to be fitted with glasses it was a difficult task to find just the kind that she needed, but it was finally accomplished. Dr. Little placed them on her and led her to the window for the first time.

It was almost like being born into a new world for her. Of course a good many things she had a general idea of through hearing people talk about them.

Directly opposite the infirmary a man was walking about on the flat roof of a house. It was the first object her eyes rested upon. "What is it?" asked Dr. Little. "It must be a man," she answered. So on, one by one, different objects were pointed out, and she was asked to tell what they were. A man with a pail went by. She said she thought that must be a pail because she had felt of one while she was blind. Just then a dog went by on the street. She stared in astonishment, and then cried aloud, "Oh, is that a dog? I never imagined they looked like that." Trees were a mystery to her. Their spreading limbs and autumn-tinted foliage held her spell-bound. She had never seen colors before. Electric cars were a wonderful thing, as was the electric light. She could not understand the power that was back of them.

When asked what her feelings were when she first found out that she could see, she replied: "Well, I don't know as I can tell you. My eyes seemed to be swimming in water and I thought I was looking at a lake. This mist slowly cleared away and then I saw the face of Dr. Holt. Oh, it was the first human face I had ever seen, and he is the best man in the world! I shall bless him until my dying day."

When asked if she had been out of doors, she said:

"Oh, yes, several times. I can't describe to you my sensations. I have seen so much that is beautiful, and I have so much more to see. I am learning to read now, and have got so I can pick quite a good deal out of a newspaper. I have read some by means of raised letters provided for blind folks, so it hasn't been very hard to learn the letters in print. If I could only stay here forever I would be perfectly happy."

While similar operations have been performed, it is seldom that they result so successfully as this one. To give an idea of just what her sight now is, it may be said that ten-tenths represents the normal or perfect vision. Alberta McKinnie can see four-tenths. With the glasses that have been fitted to her eyes she will be able to see better than many persons who have always seen, but who have such affections as near-sightedness, etc. She will be able to read, and even now she says she can almost thread a needle. Her eyes are new to her, so to speak, and as soon as she gets used to them she will use them much better. One peculiar thing that can be noticed about Alberta McKinnie is the change in the expression of her face. It is well known that blind people have expressionless faces as a rule, particularly those blind from birth. It was so in her case. Why should it be otherwise? What could she know of the beauties or humors that produce the various expressions in the faces of those of us who can see? She did not know what it was to laugh, but she does now, and so, little by little, each new thing that she sees produces some new emotion that causes the hitherto impassive countenance to light up with all the varying emotions of other mortals.—Portland, Me., Express.

ASSISTING COMBUSTION.—Many attempts have been made to separate the nitrogen from the atmospheric air, so as to leave only the oxygen to enter the furnace to feed the coal.

The latest attempt has been brought about by the utilization of liquid air. It has been observed that when liquid air is allowed to evaporate again to its natural state the nitrogen reaches the boiling point first, there being a number of degrees difference in just this one respect alone. All that is required is to hold the liquid air below the boiling point of one and above the other and the nitrogen will pass off on its own accord till the weight has been reduced to the proper proportion, when the remainder will be found to be just the material to give life to a slow burning fuel and to at once start up quite rapid fuel combustion.—Boston Journal of Commerce.

A telegraph from Jos. S. Elkinton, dated Yorkton, Assiniboia, Eleventh Month 11th, said, "Steadily pursuing our journey in good traveling condition."

Joseph Elkinton, of Media, and Inazo Nitobe attended the First-day forenoon meeting in Baltimore on the 12th inst. He also had private conferences with officers of the Yearly Meeting in order to have the case of the Doukhobors laid before members of the Yearly Meeting in session there this week. Some six other visitors from Philadelphia and vicinity were also in attendance.

Benjamin P. Brown, of North Carolina, writes from Paullina, Iowa, of his movements since attending Iowa Yearly and Hickory Grove Quarterly Meetings, mentioning fifteen meetings attended and most of the families in their neighborhoods visited. This brought him much among Norwegian Friends. "They are a very tender-hearted and humble minded people. I do not think I ever visited a body of Friends who are more open to receive the Truth, and more appreciate a visit. Many of these are real, convinced Friends."

Notes from Others.

What would happen if all the inhabitants of the British Isles were seized with a desire to attend a place of worship? That is a question the Quiver asks, and its answer is that, after every house of God belonging to all denominations had been filled, 25,000,000 people would be crowded out. There is space at present to seat 15,000,000. The population is 40,000,000; therefore, if all choose to attend a place of worship, the accommodation would have to be three-fifths larger than it is at present.

The Reformed Episcopal Church "condemns and rejects the following erroneous and strange doctrines as contrary to God's Word:

"That the Church of Christ exists only in one order or form of ecclesiastical polity.

"That Christian ministers are 'priests' in another sense than that in which all believers are 'a royal priesthood.'

"That the presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper is a presence in the elements of bread and wine.

"That Regeneration is inseparably connected with Baptism."

"Education, culture, and the best religious training, if they stop short of regeneration, only serve to make possible even deeper depths of sin. The worst sins can be committed only by such.

"If Satan wants a particularly infamous work done, he will do his best to get a professing Christian to do it."

Such are some of the comments lately given on the crime of Judas—not committed by a pagan, but by one instructed in the Old Testament Scriptures, "and who for nearly three years had been in close companionship with the Son of God."

The same writer concludes that money loving is the great sin of our day, and of our nation; it made Judas Iscariot what he was.

THE USE OF THE CAPITAL LETTER "I."—Zola, when in England, was much impressed with the English use of the capital "I." "Why is it," he says, "that the Englishman, when he writes of himself, should invariably use the capital letter? That tall 'I' which occurs so often in a personal narrative strikes me as being very arrogant. A Frenchman, referring to himself, writes 'je' with a small 'j'; a German, though he may gratify all his substantives with capital letters, employs a small 'i' in writing 'ich'; a Spaniard, when he uses the personal pronoun at all, bestows a small 'y' on his 'yo,' while he honors the person he addresses with a capital 'V.' I believe indeed—though I am not sufficiently acquainted with foreign languages to speak with certainty on that point—that the Englishman is the only person in the world who applies a capital letter to himself." M. Zola might have enforced his contrasts still further by referring to the Japanese, who really have no word for "I." In speaking of one's self in Japanese self-deprecatory terms are used, such as "servant," "the awkward person," "junior:" while in speaking of or to other people complimentary terms are used, such as "senior," "master," "prince" (used by young men in addressing each other familiarly). The most usual Japanese equivalent for "I" is "watakushi," which means literally "selfishness."—Buffalo Commercial.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A convention was signed at Washington on the 7th instant by the diplomatic representatives of Great Britain, Germany and the United States, for the adjustment by arbitration of claims of inhabitants of Samoa for damages resulting from the naval and military operations there last spring. King Oscar of Norway and Sweden is named as arbitrator.

The Cabinet, in Washington, has decided to establish domestic postage in the Philippines, as has been done in Cuba and Porto Rico.

A despatch dated Manila, Eleventh Month 14th, says: The United States cruiser Charleston, which had been patrolling the northern coast of Luzon, was wrecked on a reef off the northwest coast on Eleventh Month 7th. All on board were saved.

General Wheaton's operations against the insurgents in the vicinity of Dagupan have been successful in every particular. A large quantity of ordnance stores was captured. Twenty-eight Spaniards, held as prisoners by the Filipinos, were released by the operations of General Wheaton's column.

Not a shot was fired at the capture of Tarlac, the insurgent army retreating. Aguinaldo has not escaped to the mountains, but is believed to be surrounded with his army. His private secretary and seven officers have been captured. The Filipinos are greatly demoralized, and run at sight of the Americans.

Admiral Dewey and Mildred Hazen, widow of General Hazen, were married in Washington on the 9th instant.

One of the most interesting features of the Paris Exposition will be a model American postoffice, which will be up to date in every respect. Arrangements have been made with the French postal authorities by which mails for Americans in Paris will be sent to this postoffice instead of going through the regular channels. In this way much time will be saved in the distribution of United States mails.

The price of steel bars has been advanced in Pittsburg $5 a ton.

Toledo, O., has a trolley road that is doing unique work for the farmers by hauling the farm wagons themselves. It is said to be the only railread of the sort in the world.

Stories of wonderful corn crops are told in all the Western States. Stalks from twelve to fifteen feet high are common, but in Kay County, Oklahoma, one stalk has been found that measures over twenty feet, beating the record made by a Texas stalk in 1896, which measured nineteen feet and four inches. This stalk has been sent to Washington to compete for a place at the Paris Exposition.

South of Ava, in Southern Illinois, is the banner cornfield of the world. It will give this year 600,000 bushels of corn, an average of 100 bushels to the acre.

There were 314 deaths in this city last week, which is 67 less than the previous week and 83 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 161 were males and 153 females: 46 died of consumption; 29 of pneumonia; 26 of heart diseases; 24 of diphtheria; 13 of apoplexy; 13 of nephritis; 11 of inanition; 11 of cancer; 9 from casualties; 8 of typhoid fever and 8 of debility.

HOGS.—Best Western, 6¼ a 6⅜c.; others, 5¾ a 6c.

FOREIGN.—Official reports from Ladysmith by way of pigeon post to Cape Town and thence from General Buller state that General White's garrison is strongly entrenched, and, while the Boer bombardment has been continued, little damage has been done. Vigorous measures are being taken to raise the seige at Ladysmith, for which purpose the British troops are being despatched, as fast as they arrive at Cape Town, through Durban into Natal Colony.

There appears to have been a cessation of the Boer bombardments on the afternoon of the 9th, and no revival of hostilities of note has since been reported.

Lord Salisbury, at the Lord Mayor's banquet, in London, Eleventh Month 9th, outlined the Government's policy towards the South African Republics, traced the causes leading up to the war, and predicted that there was nothing for England to fear from the hostility in Continental nations.

Mount Kenia, in British East Africa, has at last been climbed. Mackinder of Oxford University, is the first man to reach the top, which is 18,000 feet above sea level.

It was officially stated in Berlin on the 8th inst., that an agreement, subject to the approval of the United States, had been reached between Great Britain and Germany, according to which the Samoan Islands, with the exception of Tutuila and the adjacent islands, will become German territory. Germany cedes to Great Britain the Tonga Islands, Savage Island and Choiseul and San Isabel, the two easterly Islands of the Solomon group, with their insular surroundings.

A despatch dated London Eleventh Month 9th, says: The afternoon papers here express satisfaction at the Samoan settlement. They are especially gratified at the evidence of the continued good understanding between the three nations. The acquisition of Tutuila is regarded as settling the seal on the expansionist policy of the United States and a great development of the American navy is anticipated and welcomed.

The final and authentic statements in regard to the decision that Germany should take over the Samoan Islands, except Tutuila, is fully endorsed by Eliot, the British member of the Commission sent there last summer to adj the difficulties that then arose. He rests his opinion the belief that as Germany would not relinquish Up that large island and Savaii, its larger neighber, w better be under control of one Government. Tutuila, ing thirty miles away, might properly belong to the Un States. Eliot says that England has received more value than she has relinquished.

Eliot says the Island of Tonga possesses one of the harbors in the Pacific, called Vivau, and since British terests in the island are now confirmed there appear be no reason why this fine harbor should not be forth The accession of the islands Ysabel and Choiseul is rega as mainly important in rounding out the British possess in New Guinea, as these two islands are really a par the New Guinea archipelago.

The removal of German Consular jurisdiction f Zanzibar is also regarded by Eliot as an important velopment in the African situation, as Zanzibar is centre of British influence near British East Africa German East Africa. Even more important in bearing the African question is the agreement to delimit boundary between British Ashantee and German T Land. This has long been a field for controversy, but Samoan agreement includes a possible solution to the plexing problem in West Africa.

s not this the fast that I have chosen? oose the bands of wickedness, to undo the y burdens, and to let the oppressed go and that ye break every yoke? Is it not al thy bread to the hungry, and that thou g the poor that are cast out to thy house? n thou seest the naked that thou cover and that thou hide not thyself from own flesh?

Then shall thy light break forth as the ning, and thine health shall spring forth dily: and thy righteousness shall go before ; the glory of the Lord shall be thy rear-d.

And if thou draw out thy soul to the hun- and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall ight rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be ne noonday. And the Lord shall guide thee inually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, make fat thy bones: and thou shalt be like atered garden, and like a spring of water, se waters fail not. And they that shall be of shall build the old waste places. Thou shalt e up the foundations of many generations; thou shalt be called the repairer of the ch, the restorer of paths to dwell in." (Isa. : 6-12).

HICH HATH THE GREATER NEED, THE POOR OF THE RICH OR THE RICH OF THE POOR?

nce the above prophetic declaration of the lition of our light rising in obscurity was scribed, intended as it was to appear with- note or comment, a letter has come to l from one who took the initiative in visit- he sorely-persecuted disciples of the Prince eace when they were in the Trans-Caucasus, subsequently was the principal agent in ining the means for their migration. He gests the query, "Is it not a purpose of Heavenly Father in committing this matter to our care so especially, not only to benefit the Doukhobors, but to be made a means of spiritual blessing to those who are thus interested in them?"

How Readest Thou?

In the reading of holy Scriptures, whether from the page of print or of memory, "the veil shall be taken away" as the heart shall turn unto the Lord. As the reader is able to bear it, that which is for him, or speaks to his condition, is unveiled or revealed. Openings in the light are presented as a fresh visitation of life, not required to be another man's openings but specially thine, and sealed as thine by the witness for Truth in the heart rightly turned.

It is not to be assumed that such openings, suited to one's special point of view, are intended invariably for others besides himself; but they are given that he to whom they are revealed shall by faithfulness to the heavenly vision pass through them into a larger day. Neither is he chargeable with spiritual openings made to others, whether as recorded in commentaries or elsewhere, except as they meet the honest witness for Truth in his own heart. "It is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is Truth."

Views of Divine truth, ideals of a higher life, may dawn upon the mind in connection with texts that might seem most inappropriate to the view opened; yet these heavenly inspirations may well be seized as of the Divine Word transcending, for our present condition, the letter of the text. That which is written remains, and stands as true as ever; it is not superseded by the witness of the Spirit, if once written by the moving of the Spirit. But its usually accepted meaning may be, for the time being, less a speaking to the reader's condition, than the present voice of "the true and holy Witness" inspiring a sense of truth or of duty in directions not evident in the text.

If we read in an open attitude of heart towards Him, the spirit of our Lord may at times speak more to us between the lines of his Scriptures than in them. He spake from above his lines as they were written; He speaks from above them as they are read. But whether it be in and through them that a Divine opening is revealed, or in an unexpected spiritual digression from them, it is that thou mayst "See that thou make all things according to the pattern shown thee in the mount."

Aimless Impulses.

Good emotions that bear no fruit in deeds have surely this effect, that they deaden themselves. It is no new discovery that passive impressions, apart from active obedience to them, grow weaker and weaker. But habits of action which keep pace with best feelings grow stronger and stronger. The proper outlet for faithfulness to all good impressions should be occupied, else sensibility to them begins to wither and die,—like the heath in the desert, "not knowing when good cometh."

Such is one of the blighting effects of works of fiction, even if they are written to excite good and noble sentiments during the reading of them. Imaginary scenes arouse the impulses, but being imaginary they furnish no real objects on which generous impulses can be carried out into action. And thus good emotions and noble principles of the heart are awakened to die at their birth. Where emotions are excited for their own sake, what wonder if they grow fainter, till moral insensibility is all that is left.

Theatrical exhibitions being likewise fictitious presentations, only exceeding printed fiction in vividness, have the same withering tendency. Spectators sit as idle witnesses of scenes calling for mercy, relief, righteous testimony or influence, fervid zeal, variously mixed impulses, only to be schooled in a moral paralysis by being taught that emotions are an end to themselves, a plaything of the hour.

Such surely are diversions that divert. They divert from the witness for truth and good in the heart. And when public religious exercises also are not entertaining except as they are made exciting, their reaction is a ministration of death rather than of life.

Children are rich in an emotional life that needs to be guided to worthy objects of exercise. To deny them the fruit of a right impulse, or to nip it in the bud, is to begin to teach young men that though they "shall see visions," they are not expected to be obedient to them. If no right objects for right feelings are allowed, by and by there will be no right feelings for right objects.

In John Fiske's recent work, entitled "The Dutch and Quaker Colonies in America" (vol. II, page 139), is found this acknowledgment: "There can be little doubt that the Christian ideal has been, on the whole, more perfectly realized among the Quakers than with any other sect of Christians."

My Providential Deliverance.

Dr. Hutchinson and the other physicians had daily conversations with me, and exercised their knowledge and intuition to diagnose my case. Dr. H. stated that I was legally committed, and evidently seemed greatly perplexed over my commitment, I learned later that the physicians considered me "normal," and that I was not a fit subject for an insane asylum, and so informed my people, which brought my brother to visit me, just after one week of confinement. My brother seemed glad that I was "improving" so fast, and then told me that I could have my release if I would go West and not remain in Pittsburg. I refused to accede to such terms, on the ground that my incarceration was unjustifiable and that all the newspapers reported me insane, and if he would make the proper retraction and place me in my true light before the community, I would feel fully vindicated and attend to my affairs.

To this my brother would not agree, and so I was left to ponder over my situation, fully convinced that my action was right in refusing to entertain such a proposition. I was . . . . . greatly helped by the experiences of God's people and his mighty hand to deliver his own. There was Noah and Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Joseph, Gideon and Samson, Daniel and the den of lions, Paul and Silas and Peter in prison, and all of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews' heroes, saints and martyrs.

In spite of many temptations, my faith was strong and had the assurance that I would obtain deliverance through providential interposition.

Faith is the substance of things hoped for; the evidence of things not seen—and so I accepted my deliverance, as if it had already taken place and was determined not to compromise in any way. It must be remembered that no one is so anxious for liberty as the man who is a prisoner, especially under my circumstances.

Again my brother called on me; it was the second week of my confinement. He came at a time when we were all busy sweeping the floor and washing the walls. I was at my post with broom and cloth. He did not like my employment and requested that I be withdrawn from the work, which was complied with, and I had no further outside work to do except my own room and some other duties. He called again the third week with the same proposition, and was much perplexed to think that I would not avail myself of the opportunity to obtain my liberty. I expressed my views to him, and told him very plainly that I expected to get my freedom very shortly. I had my temptations and trials during these weeks. The tests came quite strong at times, but in the hour of the greatest temptation I was always strong to say "No," because I did not think it was the Lord's way of doing things. "The Lord heard and delivered me from all my fear." Ps. xxxiv. 4.

It is of ordinary occurrence to see groups of visitors pass through the different departments of the asylum. One afternoon as I was reading the Bible a gentleman came up to me, telling me he came down in my behalf. We entered into a conversation about my conversion and incarceration. The gentleman introduced himself as J. B. Corey, saying he was going to see about my being taken out of this place. I was delighted, of course, and stated that somehow I expected some one would come. I learned later that J. B. Corey, who is an old resident of Braddock, Pa., and of the Corey Gas & Coal Company, Pittsburg, while in his office, was suddenly prompted or spoken to by the Holy Spirit to go down to Dixmont to see Ruben. He has been in active Christian work for a long time, as I afterwards learned; promoted several Christian enterprises, and now the Lord gave him another bit of work. J. B. Corey was not personally acquainted with me, never having seen or heard of me before reading the account of my being railroaded to Dixmont for accepting Christ as my Saviour. He called up P. H. Laufman, an old friend, and learning from him that my incarceration was a great wrong and injustice, he arranged by telephone with Mr. Harper, president of Dixmont Hospital, to go with him to see me and learn of my condition for himself. Mr. Corey introduced me to Mr. Harper and to Ex-Mayor Kennedy, of Allegheny, who was also present.

On his return to the city, Mr. Corey at once instructed his son-in-law, Wm. Yost, Esq., attorney-at-law, to institute habeas corpus proceedings in my behalf. This was promptly executed. The case was returnable before Judge J. W. F. White, of Common Pleas Court.

My brother came to see me again, and later sent one of his "confidentials," who was formerly a bosom friend of mine, to accept his proposition to go West, as I was told that I would positively be returned to the asylum; that they would surely prove my insanity, because I said that I received a spiritual call to read the New Testament, and that Jesus Christ was the Saviour of the world. As my people could not understand nor believe it, they thought I had gone beside myself. Now, these threatenings did not affect me in the least. I felt the assurance that I would obtain my liberty, because I knew I was right, and was standing on the promises of God, that if they would cast us into prison for his sake, He would deliver us.

On the morning of the trial, the fifth week of my incarceration, quite a company had gathered at the court room—ministers, lawyers and doctors were present, my people and relatives and their attorney.

The proceedings proved to be very interesting. . . . . Dr. Hutchinson was the first witness. He testified that I was legally committed, was received at the Institution, conversed with me freely, found me very intelligent, rational, and of even temperament, and had so informed my family during the first week of my stay. Then the two "expert" physicians testified, and essayed to prove my insanity, because I stated to people that I heard a supernatural voice telling me to read the New Testament, and that Jesus Christ was the Saviour. Judge White then questioned them searchingly as to how long they had been with me, did he act in a disorderly manner, and questions along this line.

The Judge did not think, that because people claim to hear voices or see visions they must be sent to insane asylums. There are too many people who claim to have heard voices, and it is preposterous to consider them ins
The judge was very definite in his remarks, squarely rejected the evidence by which defendants intended to prove my insanity.

It is altogether an unfounded fear that the passing away of the accretions and d urements mingled with Christianity, Chris ity itself is passing away.

Christianity cannot pass away. The bu of a little straw or a few decayed leaves raise smoke sufficient to hide the stars the stars are there all the time, and whe smoke vanishes, as it will speedily do, will reappear in all their splendor.—W. Millan.

Here, too, away up in this pine-clad n, is a cluster of lakes that rival and even se in beauty and serenity the most world- d in song and story. On the west our shore line is washed by the mighty Pacific, hose wide bosom is borne a large portion e wealth and commerce of the Orient and s of the sea," bringing to the cities of nd our sister States a trade almost limit- n the vast possibilities of the future.

But as there y one Yosemite Valley—one land of the Tree Groves"—one place above all others e nature is prodigal of her gifts, one spot is broad earth where the eye can feast on iorama forever unfolding new scenes of ost enchanting and elevating description, nay be pardoned for bringing before the rs of THE FRIEND my own limited experi- and observations of the scenes thus y portrayed, which to me have yielded nded sensations of enthusiasm, as my of what constitutes true beauty and grandeur, as these surround and illuminate that one word, California!

By way of an introduction to the brief sketch of a trip undertaken the past summer through the mountains and redwoods of San Mateo County to the shores of the Western Sea, the few poetical lines subjoined may not be deemed either presumptuous or inappropriate, as expressive of my feelings and thankfulness:

ON THE WAY.

From Santa Clara's vale with fruitage rare,
Pours forth unstinted all her lavish wealth.
I went to breathe the hills' balsamic air,
And join with others in the quest of health.

Through giant redwoods to the pebbly shore,
Where rolls the great Pacific far and wide
I praise the name of Him forevermore,
Who framed the world and formed the restless tide.
The seas, the woods, the mountains Thine,
The handiwork of One Divine.

IN THE SIERRA MORENO MOUNTAINS.

How beautiful, when springtime comes!
The clouds have cleared away,
The sward is green, the skyward homes,
Are 'bowered in bloom of May.

I greet the spicy, fresh'ning breeze,
Coursing among the hills,
Beneath the shade of giant trees,
My soul with rapture thrills.

The quail's loud call, the song of birds
Makes vocal all the land.
On sunny slope, the peaceful herds,
Lend charm to scenes so grand.

I feel the quick'ning Spirit bring
A reverent sense of prayer.
Supreme o'er all, Thy praise I sing,
For Thou art everywhere.

Awake my soul, and with the day,
Thy every blessing prize,
In vale, on hill, cease not to pray,
To Him who rules the skies.

Away! go breathe the mountain air,
Climb yonder grassy hill;
The Master waits to meet thee there,
He loves and guards thee still.

AT PESCADERO PEBBLE BEACH.

I rested by the mighty deep,
Where waves and winds their vigils keep.
I asked the Lord to watch o'er me,
An atom near the great wide sea.
Millions of pebbles on the beach,
A wondrous lesson seemed to teach,
Sea-washed, all shining on the strand,
Attested an Almighty hand.
I stood entranced upon the shore,
I listened to old ocean's roar,
I watched the waves in grandeur roll,
And this the message to my soul:
"Be still," let every tumult cease,
Guide to the blessed port of peace.
And there beside the crystal sea
Spend an eternity with Thee,
Ye waves to heaven your voices raise
Ye winds forever sing his praise.

Leaving San Jose at an early hour one fine summer morning, the writer of this, with three other members of his household, wended their way through a long stretch of orchard lands to the town of Mayfield, near which is situated the great Stanford University, now a place of world-wide celebrity. Thence our road led to the foot-hills skirting Santa Clara Valley, from which some fine views are obtained of San Francisco bay, towns, hamlets, and the extensive orchards that have made this valley so famous. Climbing upward amid some fine scenery, we halted for a two hours' rest and lunch and then resumed our journey, soon reaching the summit of the Sierra Morena range of mountains, and a few miles further on were in the great redwoods. Here we saw magnificent specimens of these grand old trees, many attaining a height of two hundred to three hundred feet. As we looked up to their topmost branches in silent admiration, it almost made our heads swim to find out how tall they really were. We pushed on under the shade of these mammoths, interspersed with stately fir, oak, madrone, bay, laurel and other beautiful forest trees. Our road wound along Pescadero Creek, a clear running mountain stream, sometimes hidden from view in the dense growth of timber and over-arching branches. Toward evening, the golden rays of the setting sun were gleaming through the forest shade, and all around seemed calm, peaceful and heavenly.

Over a smooth driveway we approached the pretty little hamlet of La Honda, about thirty-seven miles from San Jose, situate in the midst of the most lovely and romantic scenery conceivable, surrounded by enormous redwoods, the pride of these mountain retreats. Here is "Sear's La Honda Hotel," a well-kept, home-like place, where a good table invites the appetite of the travellers, and where quiet rest and comfort can be obtained. This locality is a favorite camping ground, a nice clean stream meandering among the huge redwood trees, and with the mountains on either side affords good fishing and hunting. The store at La Honda is quite an acquisition, as campers can there find their wants supplied. The climate in this sheltered region is mild and salubrious and most conducive to health. We much regretted our short stay here, as ways to many points of interest radiating therefrom can be visited. After a good night's rest, we started out in the freshness and glow of the early morning toward Pescadero, passing through a succession of forest and mountain scenery that afforded a constant source of pleasure and delight. After an easy drive of seventeen miles we arrived at the town of Pescadero and found the "Swanton House" as a hotel all that could be desired.

The great attraction of this section is the ocean and Pebble Beach. Here the great Pacific is seen in all its grandeur, as its waves roll in on the whitened shore. On the beach there are millions of rare and beautiful pebbles, and it is a fascinating occupation for days and weeks together to sit or recline at leisure, to search for and gather the fine specimens that abound. Although it takes much time and no little patience to collect all that one could wish, yet the incentive to excel some others in the search is enhanced by the results obtained. We spent about four days gathering a goodly quantity, which will be treasured as a memento of our visit and to exhibit to our friends. For a great many years a large number of persons make this delightful trip, and no tourist coming to California should fail to see this famous and wonderful pebble beach. Pescadero is situated in the midst of a good farming and dairying country; the crops of oats, hay, corn, barley, beans, etc., are generally profitable and abundant. A large creamery on the outskirts of the town, turns out a fine quality of butter, which finds a ready market elsewhere.

There are several points of interest around Pescadero. We went to Pigeon Point light-house, seven miles therefrom, one of the first class; in all its appointments nearly perfect. We were politely shown over the interior by one of the keepers who explained to us all the details of this immense, tall, whitened structure, standing out in bold relief against the deep blue sky, as it listens, spectre-like, to the never-ceasing surging of the restless sea. The costly Parisian revolving light of about sixty-eight thousand candle-power, with its highly polished prismatic glass, was well worth seeing. The climb up the great spiral iron stairway, extending one hundred and twenty-five feet from the base to the top, a very skilful and substantial piece of mechanism, taxes one's strength. But once at the dizzy height the outlook is superb, and the marine views obtained are something grand, amply compensating for the waste of physical strength.

We were told of mossy glens a few miles distant, where the tall California brake (or tree fern), and many other varieties of the more beautiful and delicate ferns grow in great profusion, but our limited stay precluded a visit thereto.

Many roads diverge from Pescadero—a forty mile seaside drive southward to Santa Cruz, one of our popular coast watering places, another of twenty to Half Moon Bay, and thence via Redwood City or San Mateo on the return route to San Jose; all affording a great variety of fine scenic views—ocean, bay, mountain, forest and valley blending in one harmonious whole.

Our faithful mare took us safely up and down the steep mountain grades, so by making an early start she accomplished the first day's journey of thirty-seven miles with comparative ease. We in turn walking up the most precipitous parts of the road, being amply repaid by this healthful exercise, combined with the fine views obtained along the way.

In this clear, bracing climate, such trips are a very delightful change; and now in winding up this brief, imperfect sketch of a summer's jaunt it must not be forgotten that the Author of all our unnumbered blessings has implanted within us a laudable desire to seek enjoyment in those outward recreations, if it is subordinated to the higher attributes of our nature and his eternal praise and glory. With reverent thankfulness I could exclaim with the psalmist of old, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches." For has He not imbued us with a sense of his all-embracing love and goodness and a keen perception of the greatness and majesty of his power?

Intending visitors or tourists coming to California can obtain valuable information relating to points of interest, its resources and scenic attractions, by enclosing a few postage stamps to defray expense of mailing, to the passenger department of the Southern Pacific Company, No. 4 Montgomery Street, San Francisco. Their lines of railway reach almost every section in connection with stage routes. The illustrated folders, pamphlets, guide books, maps, etc., issued by this great company for gratuitous circulation are exceedingly elaborate, attractive, and helpful.

"FOR THE FRIEND"

THE DOUKHOBORS' THANKSGIVING.

We thank thee, Lord, that over all,
Thy watch and care like sunbeams fall;
Yea, Lord, that in these solitudes
Thy loving-kindness watchful broods.

Not as the men in other lands
Who come with plenty in their hands,
And while their feast-set tables groan,
Glad hearts Thy care 'mid fulness own;

Our empty hands, dear Lord, confess
Our hunger and our helplessness;
Too weak our words to tell our needs,
Yet thou the hungry raven feeds.

And thou, our Father, knowest our need;
Let but our hunger dumbly plead,
That floodgates of thy mercy wide
May open yet and we be satisfied.

We thank thee, Lord of life and light,
That in our dark Canadian night,
Thou shinest in the ascendant yet.
Shine in us always, though stars rise and set.

We know that those in other days,
Whose halting feet trod other ways,
Yet from the oppressors' rod set free,
Knew their deliverance was of thee.

We thank thee, Lord, that we have known
Deliverance, and we gladly own
The leading of Thy outstretched hand,
That brought us to our promised land.

We thank thee, Lord, that waters wide
At thy command can still divide;
At thy command still shut the way
Against the Pharoahs of our day.

We thank thee, Prince of love and peace,
Thy suffering seed can know release;
Yet if our lot be suffering still,
We bow submissive to thy will.

We thank thee, Lord, through all our ills,
The cattle on ten thousand hills,
The treasures hidden in the mine
Are all of thee, they all are thine.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Friends and the Indians of Pennsylvania.

It is recorded of James Daniel, of Salem, New Jersey, who died Tenth Month 26th, 1726, that about the year 1680 he settled in Alloway's Creek Township in the county of Salem, N. J., "at which time the white people were but few, and the natives a multitude. He learned their language perfectly, and has frequently said at that time the natives were a sober, grave and temperate people, and used no manner of oath in their speech."

In the memorial of Ellen Evans, an elder of Gwynedd, Pa., who died in 1765, it is stated that she firmly believed "that the grace of God which bringeth salvation had appeared unto all men;" and that she delighted to converse with our uninstructed Indians about their sentiments of the Supreme Being; and often said she "discovered evident traces of Divine goodness in their uncultivated minds."

No Indian historian has recorded the events which led to the weakening of the friendship formerly existing between the Indians and the inhabitants of Pennsylvania. From the testimony of others, however, we can clearly see that the alienation of feeling, and the bloody warfare which followed was not due in the first place to the perfidy of the Indians. The impositions practised upon them by traders and in the purchase of their lands, the protection given to the Iroquois or Five Nations against the Delawares, and especially the continual intrusion of the whites upon their hunting grounds contributed largely to this altered state of feeling, and rendered them more than willing to join with the French, who earnestly solicited their friendship, in engaging in open hostilities with the English, even before war was actually declared between France and England, but which in 1756 soon involved the settlements of these respective countries in America in all the calamities of border warfare.

Catharine Phillips, a Friend from England, then on a religious visit to this country, during the beginning and progress of the Indian war recorded in her journal: "And here I remark that we were in Philadelphia at the time when the first soldiers that had come there commissioned from the English government, arrived at that city under the command of General Braddock. I said a cloud of darkness came with them. The Lord had settled this colony by peaceable means, he had hitherto protected it by his own almighty arm, and it prospered greatly, but henceforward disunion and disturbance prevailed and increased in it."

The defeat of General Braddock in the Western part of Pennsylvania took place in the Seventh Month, 1755, and "the whole frontier laid exposed to the hatchet and torch of the remorseless red man."

In the letters of Samuel Fothergill, an eminent minister from England, and who was in this country during this eventful period, we find mention of the complete change which then occurred in the relations between the whites and the Indians.

Under date of Eleventh Month 24th, 1755 he writes: "Very distracted is the present state of this province; several cruel murders have been committed on the frontiers, and sixteen people destroyed about the ninth instant with less than ninety miles of this city which was done by a gang of banditti, part Indians, with some Irish among them. I was at the place about five weeks ago, but do not understand any Friends are hurt. The five Indian nations who conquered the Delawares, sold some part of the ancient inheritance of these last to the proprietors, some few years since, alleging the right of sale to be in them as conquerors, and the goods were divided among the five nations, principally to the discontent of the Delawares, who still judged themselves justly entitled to some equivalent for their land, which either the intention of the proprietors, or their want of information, induced them to disregard; and is pretty much on this land, and land fraudulently obtained, that the barbarities are committed."

Twelfth Mo. 17th, 1755, "The Indians have complained without redress, and are now up in arms, and have destroyed many people; there were the bodies of two men, whom the Indians had killed and scalped, brought down in great parade to this city, from the back parts; multitudes went to see them, and seem loudly to clamor for war. The ancient methods of dealing with the Indians upon the principles of equity and justice seem neglected, the spirit of war and destruction endeavoring to break low in order to reduce this pleasant, populous province to its ancient wilderness condition."

First Mo. 19th, 1756.—"The present state of this province is very distressing; the Indians cruel and bloody, destroying men, women, children, and burning their houses; which has asioned great trouble and raised the clamor he people against Friends, who dare not re- violence with violence. Yet too few lay it perly to heart and learn righteousness."

econd Mo., 20th, 1756.—"Many thousand nds of the province's money, have by the embly's Committee been laid out in erecting s upon the frontiers, and placing men in n; a step as prudent, and likely to be attend- vith as much success as an attempt to hedge birds or the deer. The neighborhoods of se forts have been, since their being erected, scenes of the greatest barbarity; in con- pt and mockery of the attempt, eleven people g destroyed a few days ago within a mile of of their forts."

ourth Mo. 28th, 1756.—"The distress of province is great; its commotions violent; the desolations of a cruel Indian war im- ding, and the legislature in a great degree tuated; it seems like a judicial desertion ll their counsels, and every step they take eases their perplexity. Friends have inter- ed for the restoration of peace, and borne r testimony faithfully."

ourth Mo. 29th, 1756.—"The frontiers of nsylvania continue to be harassed by the barous Indians who destroy man, woman child. All attempts to defend themselves inst them seem vain, and the means of re- ing peace, to-wit, doing the Indians justice ully paying them for their lands, were in the inning shamefully neglected, and will now ery difficult to bring about."

he following instructive remarks are made Catharine Phillips, the Friend from England, viously mentioned, in regard to her exercises his time of deep distress:

During the time of the people's being in so at confusion and distress, on account of the an war, my mind was much exercised; but several months, I know not that I could at even secretly, petition the Almighty for r relief, with any evidence of such a peti- arising from the spring of Divine life. a little before a stop was put to their dep- tions, my spirit was almost continually hed with intercession, that the Lord might leased to stay the sword; and in two public tings I was concerned in a like manner; and l not hear that any mischief was done after time by any Indians who had occasioned disturbance, and a cessation of arms en- . I record this as an instance of Divine om instructing his servants to ask what is sing to him to grant, as well as restraining n from petitioning for what might be ex- ingly desirable to themselves, before the er time; and I believe that if ministers thus under the government of that spirit of om which giveth liberty in the appointed on acceptably to approach the throne of ne Grace, it would be more evident that asked in the name and spirit of Jesus by r prayer being answered.

I think it worth remarking that the termi- on of this Indian war was at last effected he peaceable interposition of Friends. An an chief with other Indians in friendship Pennsylvania, being occasionally in Phila- hia, Friends obtained leave of the Governor ave a conference with them in order to en- or, through their interference to bring t an accommodation with the Indians now ar with the British colonies. As we were admitted to attend this conference, I mention it. It evinces the veneration the Indians retained for the memory of William Penn, and for his pacific principles, and their great regard to Friends, whom they styled his children. Several of their women sat in this conference, who, for fixed solidity, appeared to me like Roman matrons. They scarcely moved, much less spoke, during the time it was held; and there was a dignity in the behavior and countenance of one of them, that I cannot forget. I was informed that they admit their most respected women into their counsels."

Visit of J. S. Elkinton and William B. Harvey to the Exiles in Canada.

FORTY MILES NORTH OF YORKTON, ASSINIBOIA,

Eleventh Month 2nd, 1899.

WM. EVANS.

Dear Friend:—Temperature 10° this morning. We left Yorkton yesterday about 2:30 P. M., in two wagons—one load mostly made up of baggage—and reached Alfred Hutchinson's, a progressive dairy farmer near White Sand River. It was a surprise to find a good sized dairy, with a cream separator, with a gasoline engine for motive power. Prairie chickens were abundant. A coyote was seen near the trail, and we heard the bark of another after night fall; gophers are very annoying to the farmers, as are also badgers. Taking a northerly course, crossing White Sand River, partly around Good Spirit lake, we approached the first village whose name is long, and with others, need not be mentioned here. We were surprised at the substantial character of the houses; real mechanical skill was apparent on every hand, both in wood work and finishing. The appointments are as yet very plain, but cleanliness is commendable. Wells of water were found in both villages visited. In the latter village our sympathies were particularly with a poor man, groaning on his bed, having been injured while working on railroad construction. A piece of stone flew and struck him in the eye, bursting it. He was thirty-five miles from a doctor and we did what we could for him. In the second village we found no potatoes or onions, and not over ten pounds of wool in both villages. We have authorized the purchase of one thousand pounds or more of wool, and plans are working to assist the light hauling force of the Doukhobors in getting the potatoes from Yorkton where the stock has been gathered. Thoughtful Christian people who know of these new comers are universal in their praise. The family with whom we lodge tonight, are near two villages, and though prejudiced unfavorably in advance of the settlement of these people, now speak in the highest terms of them. They have employed one of the young men for nearly a year, and allow him to take a team to distant points, which they never did with other employés. We have but started in the work and feel increasingly the importance of an investigation into the needs of these Doukhobors. They are not asking alms, and want to refund what kind friends are giving. They are particularly anxious for a supply of seed for spring planting—oats, rye and flaxseed being among the staples. They also ask for mill stones to be run by wind power. Wheat can be procured and ground down: white flour is more expensive.

ELEVENTH MONTH 3d.—Temperature 33°. In pursuing our labors, many cases present calling forth our sympathies. One woman in middle life lost a daughter on ship board, she being the one who caused the quarantine of the second ship load at Halifax. The mother has been unable to overcome the effects of the exposure incident to the occurrence. Some are extremely poor, not receiving the support of their fellows in as full measure as would be desired.

Of the data which we are collecting, that in regard to the exiled fathers, sons and brothers in Siberia, is most affecting. Our interpreter was quite overcome at one time, realizing in a measure as we all did, the heart aches which have been brought about by adherence to the peace principles. Eleven in one village are separated from their home people.

Our packages of malted milk seem to be of service in each village, and the few English primers brought with us are being left where they are likely to be of most use.

Our host here is truly one of nature's noblemen; he and his wife have the interest of their near neighbors thoroughly at heart, as we learned to-day in making our rounds. Among other facts learned from A. Hutchinson, a practical farmer, is that grazing can be more successfully carried on than wheat growing in this neighborhood, the season being so short that the cereal is apt to be frosted. Between Winnipeg and Yorkton, however, a large acreage is successfully grown. Horses, young and old, seem to thrive out of doors, all winter. They paw away the snow to gain their living. Our host had one rather too smart for the rest; they would clear away a space, then were driven from it by their crafty leader. A temperature of 40° to 50° below zero, or lower, is endured, and the animals come out in good shape in the spring. A noble 1665 pounder was shown in evidence.

A number of specimens of the handiwork of the Doukhobors have been given us; some show a marked degree of skill. In one house two young women were making a coat, which would do credit to a Philadelphia tailor. The cloth was of their own weaving, and all wool. They make their own looms and do their own spinning, though wheels are scarce in most instances.

Their expressions of deep gratitude for favors shown them by friends, exhibited by kneeling and almost touching their heads to the ground, and in other ways, was not as we would have it, but it did not seem in place to object, and we take this means of conveying their thanks to those who have, as was told us by one woman to-day, given to the Lord. Two villages were visited where the inhabitants were found comfortably situated, financially.

ELEVENTH MONTH 4th.—Temperature 23°. Visits in the Good Spirit lake district were finished on the fourth instant. The drive over the Fort Pelly trail was made this afternoon as far as Pollock's saw mill. Each night we seem able to find lodgings, and are made comfortable, even under sod roof.

ELEVENTH MONTH 5th.—A beautiful bright morning, and, making a late start, we set out for the villages along the Assiniboine River. The Doukhobors were dressed in their First-day costumes, and looked very neat. While our mid-day lunch was preparing, the girls chanted one or more hymns; the scene was touching.

Eleventh Month 6th.—After visiting two settlements we are able to form a judgment as to their condition. The matter of transportation is a heavy item. The distances are so great a number of teams have been overworked, and others bought by the Russians at high prices, are hardly equal to the work to be done. One village of considerable size has but two horses left, two having been burned and two died. In another were thirteen horses. Part of our work is to have the strong help the weak, and there are many houses, even villages, where poverty is only too apparent. In the whole Good Spirit Lake colony there were scarcely one hundred and fifty bushels of potatoes; but little flour, except in two small settlements, where want was not apparent. Here in Fort Pelly we find the Yorkton doctor, who has a patient here over fifty miles distant, and we have engaged him to visit the various cases of sickness and accident which we found. The doctor has had some rough experiences in his travels over this country of magnificent distances.

We have arranged for the purchase of over one thousand pounds of wool, and are endeavoring to "oil the wheels" as we move along. The sloughs are mostly frozen over, and the trails though rough in places are not to be dreaded. The weather is delightful, days are short and people are slow getting out in the mornings. We start this morning for Thunder Hill settlement. We are in excellent health.

Truly,

W. B. Harvey.

Michailofka,
Near Boundary of Assiniboia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, Eleventh Month 8th, 1899.

Wm. Evans.

Dear Friend:—Fort Pelly might well be called an outpost of civilization. We reached it after dark, though could discern the old fort and the elevated lookout used in former times to warn of the approach of Indians. The fort is now occupied by the Hudson Bay Company, whose stores are conspicuous throughout this northern country. Formerly they preferred that the world should regard it as a home for bears and wolves, but Englishmen passing through tickled the soil and found something of its value for plant growth. Its fame spread abroad and the company which had, to all intents, had possession of an immense territory since 1670, was approached by the Canadian government, who paid a large sum for the northwest territory, the company reserving two sections in each township.

Leaving Pelly we took a northeast course. The first village was Stradaefka, which means suffering, they having been much afflicted, and had much sickness. It is our practice for J. S. E. to visit the houses, while the writer through an interpreter gathers statistics, endeavoring to find what are the pressing needs, tell of the interest of sympathizing friends, who are giving assistance. The villagers are always brought together, often in a room of a person in affliction. "The Grand-father," as J. S. E. is lovingly called, has been favored to speak words of comfort and encouragement, and this is by no means a small part of the service in hand. Scenes are presented not to be forgotten. One afternoon we visited a village and sent messengers to another colony near by. After the joint interview, the company followed us down the steep hillside to the river, and as we approached the light raft, we were greeted with a chanting of hymns. We were pushed across the river by two boys who pulled on a heavy rope strung from bank to bank. The grouping of the women and girls with their peculiar head gear and dress and the feeling as shown by their voices, with the picturesque back ground, was a scene most touching. The sounds followed us to a distance as we walked to the next village. Our teams forded the river, the baggage having to be removed and ferried across to prevent soaking. That night was spent at Aslabashdinija. No exception could be taken at the treatment received, and the courtesy shown by the Doukhobors to one another is striking, particularly so as we learn a little of the meanings of their actions. We are presented from time to time with specimens of their handiwork, and creditable specimens they are. An outlet for such handiwork through a trustworthy agent is one need. As we go our rounds we find much fever, contracted mainly before coming to this country, and numerous cases of chronic ailments are found.

In some villages the houses are of rather temporary construction, but in all cases are warm—the brick oven, which is a universal accompaniment, serves a double purpose, of baking and heating. The interiors are quite damp and one's glasses are always covered with moisture on entering. There is a great need for better transportation. Young untrained horses have in many instances been purchased and they are quite unequal to the work. It is to be hoped that experience will in measure right such matters.

In some villages quite an amount of food was grown, mainly carrots and potatoes, but owing to the late date of planting, a large proportion was frosted. A lack of practical knowledge in hauling teams, American plows, and in planting, is apparent.

In some places there was found food to last for but a very short space of time. The people are skilful in handling tools, and if once put on their feet there seems no doubt but that they will be self-supporting. Wool is in demand on all sides, and in most villages spinning wheels are needed. They can make all their own clothing if they have wool and flax; the latter can be grown here. Except in a few instances, there is not likely to be immediate suffering from want of wearing-apparel; but during the long winter evenings much could be done, when coal oil for lighting is secured, and material on which to work.

According to previous arrangements, unknown to ourselves, a delegation of leading men met today. In addition notice was sent out, and members of six villages came together at this point, and a very satisfactory interview resulted. The whole north colony is represented by three men who act as an executive committee for the whole. At one place an interpreter called at random on a little five year-old boy, who repeated the Commandments to the sixth.

We see comparatively few men. They are out working on the railroads.

After our meeting to-day, there was not sufficient time either to return to Fort Pelly or make the next settlement we wish to visit. Some of the time was spent in seeking the post marking the dividing point between Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, just a little south of Thunder Hill. The iron stake was rather insignificant for such an important land mark. The task of surveying through the many sloughs is, to say the least, laborious.

Eleventh Month 8th.—3 P. M.—Fort Pelly.—We have gotten thus far on our return from the North Colony. The ride was very rough, and the fording over Swan River almost resulted in an upset for one of the wagons. After laying in supplies we expect to proceed to South Colony, and will probably be engaged thereat for over a week when we hope to return to Yorkton and receive mail from our home people.

Sincerely,

W. B. Harvey.

Growth By Suffering.

Did you ever look upon the face of a mature Christian who had passed through the furnace of suffering and whose heart had rested upon God during every moment of trial? If so you have seen an expression on that face which is not a common heritage of the race. There may be lines of pain there, indicating that its owner has suffered, but there are no signs of peevishness or discontent. On the contrary, there is the sign of the heavenly peace with which Christ marks all whose souls are stayed on Him. It is not true that God sends suffering to any one in a spirit of cruelty. It is seldom that suffering is more than a permitted trial, but the fact remains that the soul that is rightly affected by it draws spiritual strength from the very fires of the fiercest furnace of trial.

There comes to memory the face of one of earth's most patient sufferers. She was young and fair in the beginning, but both youth and beauty were swallowed up by pain, and Summer friends fell away, and she knew what it was to be companionless, so far as the friends of her youth were concerned. But she was never lonely, for the Divine One was with her, and she drew inspiration and comfort and wisdom from His presence. Suffering intensely, almost without intermission, she ever thought of the welfare of others, and she talked of her own affliction with reluctance. On her face the glory of the heavenly country was displayed. Out of her eyes there shone the peace of God. On the last day of her earthly life, when every breath was a sharp agony, the same thoughtfulness for others that had marked her entire career was displayed, and those who were brought into intimate association with her believed that she never entertained a selfish thought. To spend a half hour in her company and listen to her thoughtful inquiries concerning others who were sufferers, was to receive new and stimulating ideas concerning the true meaning of unselfishness. It was likewise to receive mental illumination touching the highest ideals of Christian service.

Happy that disciple who accepts suffering as the necessary means whereby one is fashioned into the image of the heavenly. With such an one the Lord, who touched the climax of sorrow in His experience, will sympathize and dwell, leading Him into experiences of the divine that tongue cannot describe and bring peace even in the midst of pain and alarm.

More than Five Miles Up in a Balloon.

Two æronauts, Professor Berson, of Berlin, d Spencer, an Englishman, recently made a narkable balloon ascent from London. The lloon, filled with hydrogen, reached a height 27,500 feet—more than five miles. Com-te scientific apparatus was taken, and some uable observations were made. In describing ascent, Prof. Spencer said:

"When the balloon was let go it shot straight at a perpendicular rate of 1,000 feet in a nute for 10,000 feet, when an air current re it in a southeasterly direction. When the loon was 18,000 feet high it took a south-sterly direction. When we were over the Isle Dogs we saw a magnificent panorama. The glish Channel lay at our feet. Ships were lit-black dots. The coast of France was dis-ctly visible, and the vast expanse of the rth Sea touched the horizon.

"At 25,000 feet we had a decided feeling of ziness. Breathing became difficult. I was ut to remark to Prof. Berson that I felt a uliar sensation, when he called:

"'Spencer, oxygen, oxygen!'

"That was the signal arranged for the inhal-of compressed oxygen, which had been tak-along in a tube. I seized the respirator and aled the oxygen, and so did Prof. Berson. result was marvelous. We felt new life could attend to the sandbags and the ma-ulation of the balloon as well as if on the nd. Prof. Berson was very pale, and he told that I was, too.

We continued to soar upward, but there no appreciable difference in the rarity of atmosphere. When at a higher altitude I curious to ascertain the effect of the at-phere and I removed the respirator.

In about a quarter of a minute I felt the e feeling of giddiness creeping over me. n Prof. Berson called again. "Spencer, ox-n!" I inhaled the oxygen and had the same ation as before. Finally we reached 27,-feet, which was not quite the record of sher when he was nearly asphyxiated. In pinion, we might have gone much higher out inconvenience, as long as we inflated lungs with oxygen. But there were only bags of ballast left, and therefore I warned . Berson that it was not safe to throw any e away.

At 27,500 feet the thermometer showed 29 ees below zero. We felt limp and weak. We ered and trembled although wrapped in lots annel. The cold was shocking. All the llic articles, the ballast bag hooks, the steel of the compressed oxygen, and other al substances were coated with ice. The sky intense blue. The sun was so dazzling that ared not look at it.

We made the descent at terrific speed in the r altitudes. When the ballast bags were wn out to steady the balloon, the sand scat-l in the air and played around the fittings of ear. It was only when we were within 10,-feet of the earth and in a warmer atmos-e that the balloon began to descend stead-We alighted gently in a field of stubble."

"My Mother is Praying for Me."—At time the engineer of a long and heavy saw another train approaching on the track. He knew a collision was inevita-What should he do? To leave his post and jump from the train would be perilous to himself and might prove disastrous to the lives and property of others. He concluded he ought to remain and do his best to overcome the evil threatened. Just then he thought, "This is my day. My mother is praying for me." This inspired him with new courage and strength. He gave the signal for "down brakes," put forth all the energy and skill at his command to stop his train, and awaited the issue. The crash came, and although some damage was done, and all experienced a great shock, no lives were lost, and our engineer was not even bruised. Did it only happen so? Was this a bit of "good luck?" Rather let us believe that it was a special providence, and that God watched over that young man and preserved him in answer to the prayers of his mother.—The Christian.

The Great American Disease.

Worry is the most popular form of suicide. Worry impairs appetite, disturbs sleep, makes respiration irregular, spoils digestion, irritates disposition, warps character, weakens mind, stimulates disease and saps bodily health. It is the real cause of death in thousands of instances where some other disease is named in the death certificate. Worry is mental poison; work is mental food.

When a child's absorption keeps him from sleeping, or when he tosses and turns from side to side, muttering the multiplication table or spelling words aloud when sleep does come, then that child shows he is worrying. It is one of nature's danger signals, raised to warn parents, and in mercy the parent should take a firm stand. The burden of its daily tasks should be lessened, the tension of its concentration should be lessened, the hours of its slavery to education should be cut short.

When a man or woman works over in dreams the problems of the day, when the sleeping hours are spent in turning the kaleidoscope of the day's activities, then there is either overwork or worry, and most likely it is the worry that comes from overwork.

Worry is forethought gone to seed. Worry is discounting possible future sorrows so that the individual may have present misery. Worry is the father of insomnia. Worry is the traitor in our camp that dampens our powder, weakens our aim. Under the guise of helping us to bear the present, and to be ready for the future, worry multiplies enemies within our own mind to sap our strength.

Worry is the dominance of the mind by a single, vague, restless, unsatisfied, fearing and fearful idea. The mental energy and force that should be concentrated on the successive duties of the day is constantly and surreptitiously absorbed by this one fixed idea. The full, rich strength of the unconscious working of the mind, that which produces our best success, that represents our finest activity, is tapped, led away and wasted on worry.—Evening Post.

Items Concerning the Society.

Telegrams from Jos. S. Elkinton as late as the 20th inst. report a safe return to Yorkton from the North and South Colonies. That he and William B. Harvey were starting for Prince Albert some 200 miles further Northwest, where the immigrants who accompanied Jos. S. Elkinton and William B. Harvey from Winnipeg and Selkirk are settling.

All the three cars of corn meal with one of rolled oats and that especially made up for the sick, shipped from Philadelphia on the 20th ultimo, had safely arrived in Canada. Another car of corn meal was asked for, in addition to the second car of food and clothing to be shipped on the 24th inst. Our friends were well.

Further particulars concerning Wilson Sturge, the business administrator for the Doukhobor colonies in Cyprus, appear in a private letter from John Bellows. Just before the steamer left Cyprus he took a long walk with a young man, and "on coming on board he remarked that he had done too much. He seemed exhausted with the effort, and three or four days after he died. As the vessel was near Malta, the body was landed for an autopsy and interment. The medical men found a fatty growth in the heart, which they pronounced the cause of his death.

"Fifty years ago the firm of J. & C. Sturge, his uncle and father, was the largest in our port,—turning over a million pounds a year. But conditions changed, and at last the business failed. This was partly from the refusal of Wilson Sturge, then become its head partner, to deal in malting barley. But Wilson never rested till the private debts were cleared in full; and it was to earn money to accomplish this that he banished himself to Poti on the Black Sea, as agent to a large exporting firm,—foregoing all the comforts of his home and family. It was at Poti that Joseph J. Neave, [who lately has reached America for service in Baltimore and North Carolina Yearly Meetings] and I visited him for a couple of days,—a time of favor I shall never forget, nor the sense of how much his sorrows had ripened and deepened him."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The foreign commerce of the United States seems likely to make its highest record of the century in the closing year of that period. The exports of Tenth Month are larger than those of any preceding Tenth Month, the total for the ten months ending with the Tenth Month is greater than the total for the corresponding period in any preceding year, and it is apparent that for the first time in our history the foreign commerce of the year will exceed $2,000,000,000. For the ten months ending with Tenth Month, 1899, the figures of the Treasury Bureau of Statistics show the total export to be $1,029,242,000, while in the corresponding months of last year they were $987,879,000. This remarkable increase in exportations is the more surprising because of the absence of the excessive demand abroad for our breadstuffs which characterized the year 1898. In that year the short crops abroad and plentiful supplies of breadstuffs of all kinds in the United States resulted in an abnormally large exportation of breadstuffs, so that the exportation of agricultural products in the present year naturally falls about $35,000,000 below that of the corresponding period of last year. Yet the total exportations for the ten months are, as already indicated, more than $40,000,000 in excess of those of last year.

A postal deficiency of $6,610,777 for the fiscal year just closed, almost a 27 per cent. decrease from last year's deficiency, is shown in the annual report of Third Assistant Postmaster General E. C. Madden. The total receipts from all sources were over $95,000,000. Over 4,700,000 stamps in all have been supplied to the Philippines, 4,080,000 to Porto Rico, 18,420,000 to Cuba and 45,000 to Guam during the fiscal year. New York and Chicago mail 35 per cent. of the entire second class mail matter.

Exports of grain from the port of Philadelphia last week amounted to 1,337,143 bushels, making the total for the year 37,796,111 bushels, an increase over the same period of last year of more than 3,500,000. According to statistics compiled for the Commercial List and Price Current, the total imports for the first ten months of the year amounted in value to $40,323,671, an increase of $8,563,678 over the same period; the exports to $55,-041,234, an increase of $9,368,641, and the duties to $18,047,975.55, an increase of $1,454,981.55. Last month's figures, as compared with Tenth Month of 1898 were: Imports, $3,945,172, against $3,950,104; exports, $6,594,035, against $3,950,104, and duties, $1,564,419.71, against $1,984,505.18.

The appeal of the people of Porto Rico for legislation to provide suitable commercial opportunities, leads Senator Lodge to declare that Congress ought not to undertake to erect a civil government there, but should give the Porto Ricans the benefit of our financial system and of our tariff laws. At present Porto Rico is in worse condition than formerly under Spanish authority, as Spanish markets are now denied and our own have not been opened to the people. Representative Lodge believes the credit of the United States, as well as the dictates of humanity toward the Porto Ricans, demands that the island be promptly relieved from its distressing situation.

Our Chinese exports increased nearly 40 per cent. last year; the gain of all European countries was less than one per cent. Cotton goods from the United States are driving out the product from other countries. American oil also maintains its supremacy in the China markets.

About half the cases appealed to the Colorado Supreme Court are reversed, the majority of them on technicalities, due largely to the fact that judges of the county courts are not necessarily lawyers.

The Tennessee Supreme Court has decided against the American Tobacco Company in a test case, brought to ascertain if cigarettes could be sold in Tennessee under the Rogers Anti-Cigarette law of 1897. The Court held that the law providing for a revenue tax on cigarettes could not stand against the criminal law prohibiting such sale.

There are over 2,500 travelling libraries in the United States. Wisconsin has 215.

In almost every county in Kansas there are fine farms owned and operated by Kansas women without the aid of men.

A despatch from San Francisco dated the 17th instant, says—The entire whaling fleet, with the exception of the steam barks Galena, Grampus, Narwhal and Fearless, which will winter in the Arctic, has now reached this port. The Fearless, the only vessel which did not make a catch, will put up at Herschel Island, and will probably not be heard of until next Seventh Month. The entire catch this season is as follows: Bowhead whales, 113, right whales, 18. The California caught 32 sperm whales. The seven whalers which have just reached here brought over 53,000 pounds of bone, 3,244 barrels of oil, 200 fox skins, of which 70 were white, and 200 pounds of ivory.

Astronomers in this country were disappointed last week in their failure to witness the expected shower of Leonids—only a few of those bodies having been detected, part of the time cloudy weather prevented any observations.

A special to the Baltimore Morning Herald from Hancock, Md., says :

"George Smith, who lives in Fulton county, Pa., about twelve miles from this place, reports that an aerolite fell on his farm early Thursday morning, and is buried in a field near his barn. He and his family were awakened about 2 o'clock by a loud, hissing noise, accompanied by a bright flash of light and a loud peal of what they thought was thunder. At day-light he discovered a circular piece of ground, about 100 feet in diameter, having the appearance of having been recently plowed. He believes a portion of a meteor is buried in his cornfield."

A special to the News from Cumberland, Md., says :

"A large meteor fell near Grafton, W. Va., yesterday morning. A portion, weighing 15 pounds, was dug out of the ground. It is of glassy character, streaked with pewter like metal."

When reports that the plague had broken out at Santos reached Washington, Surgeon general Wyman directed Acting Assistant Surgeon Havelburg to proceed from Rio de Janeiro to that city for the purpose of investigating the matter. A despatch from him Eleventh Month 4th, confirmed the existence of the disease, as shown by bacteriological examination. Up to that date there had been eighteen cases and six deaths at Santos.

There were 365 deaths in this city last week, which is 51 more than the previous week and 49 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 195 were males and 170 females : 43 died of consumption ; 38 of pneumonia ; 36 of heart diseases ; 24 of diphtheria; 17 of cancer; 17 of inanition; 16 of apoplexy; 11 of uræmia; 10 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 9 of inflammation of the brain; 8 of paralysis, and 7 from casualties.

FOREIGN.—The Bank of England destroys about 350,000 of its notes every week, to replace them with freshly printed ones. One evening in each week is set apart for the making of this expensive bonfire.

Lady Salisbury, wife of the British Premier, died in London, Eleventh Month 20th.

The Boers have actively resumed the shelling of Ladysmith, being repulsed with heavy losses in an engagement. They trapped and attacked a British armed train sent out from Estcourt, and, after a terrific fight, the train returned.

Special despatches from Pietermaritzburg and Lourenzo Marques say that Ladysmith is bombarded night and day and hard pressed. The Boers have destroyed one of the bridges over the Tugela River.

Unofficial reports have been received in London of two fights at Ladysmith on Fourth and Fifth-day of last week. The engagement of Fifth-day is said to have been particularly fierce and the Boers losses were heavy, while those of the British were "comparatively small."

A despatch from London, dated Eleventh Month 17th, says : "A few Leonids were seen from the Greenwich Observatory, although no photographs were secured, and a few also were observed at Romsey, Hampshire, and from the Treptow Observatory. None, however, seem to have been seen elsewhere, and, generally speaking, the European observations proved a failure.

"In Russia the Leonid displays caused a panic in many places. It was believed that the end of the world had come. Churches were open all night long, and hundreds of thousands spent the three nights in open air, fearing earthquakes and a general cataclysm. There are even rumors that in some villages Russian parents murdered their children to save them from an expected worse fate.

"There was rather a brilliant display between 2 and 5 o'clock Thursday morning at Berlin."

There was a short but very sharp earthquake at Verona, Italy, on the night of Eleventh Month 15th. It threw the inhabitants of the town into a panic.

The Society of Total Abstinence just formed in Vienna is the first ever established in Austria. Everybody drinks in Austria. An Austrian baby begins to sip beer at the age of three months, and, as it grows up, learns to consume the liquor in ever increasing quantity, until, when a full grown man, he can drink it by the gallon.

Three thousand five hundred and three vessels of all kinds passed through the Suez Canal last year, and of this number 2295 carried the British flag. The receipts for 1898 were larger than in any previous year since the opening of the canal.

It is interesting to observe that the disposition of the Japanese is apparently to look almost exclusively to the United States in educational matters, as the total number of Japanese students residing abroad, and shown by the census figures, was 2465, and of this number 2173 were in the United States.

Japan will open twenty-one new ports to foreign commerce.

Paper shingles have been introduced into Japan by an enterprising Tokyo firm as substitutes for the wooden article. The new idea is a slab of thick tarred pasteboard, more easily managed than ordinary shingles and costing only half as much.

A sharp engagement occurred at San Jacinto, five miles from San Fabian, Luzon, between the Thirty-third Regiment, of Wheaton's division, and an equal force of entrenched Filipinos. The Americans lost Major John A. Logan, and six enlisted men killed and one officer and eleven men wounded. The insurgents left eighty-one dead in the trenches, had twenty-nine men and one hundred rifles captured. The total loss is believed to have been 300.

Captain Leonhauser, with three companies on the night of Eleventh Month 18th, surprised and captured, at O'Donnell, west from Capas, an insurgent force of 200, with their rifles, 10,000 rounds of ammunition and four tons of subsistence.

General MacArthur's advance on the 20th, entered Dagupan, the northern terminus of the railroad from Manila. General Wheaton's troops had entered the town on the previous day but were withdrawn the same night.

In a paper on "The Mexico of To-day," which will appear in the forthcoming issue of the Independent, Vi President Mariscal, of Mexico, makes a statement and relates an anecdote touching Mexico's silver resources. says :

"For 300 years she has produced one-third of all t silver that was mined. The production at present more than $60,000,000 per annum. When Li Hu Chang was in Washington, he asked Senor Romero h much silver Mexico was mining and how long she co keep it up. Senor Romero, trying to be conservative, plied that Mexico was turning out $50,000,000 per ye and could keep it up for 200 years. Li would not h of such a thing. He insisted that our Minister had be so long away from his own country that he had forgott details, and that he must be mistaken about the abu dance of silver. Mexico expects to supply the world w $100,000,000 of silver per annum soon."

A Public Ledger Special has a despatch dated San I mingo, Eleventh Month 16th. It says :

General Juan Isidoro Jimenez was sworn in to-day President, with Senor Horacio Vasquez as Vice-Preside The inauguration was greeted with great enthusia by the people.

liza H. Varney in a letter to a friend writes:

At the close of one of our meetings a man his 97th year stepped into the open area nd which the Doukhobors were yet standand said when he was a very young man remembered that about the year 1818 two* ur Friends came to their meeting in Russia, one of them said if they continued faithful heir religious and peace principles the time ld come when they would have to endure ecutions, and many would have to lay down r lives in prison and in various ways, and r property would be taken from them and would be driven from their homes and exand when all this was done God would hear r cry and answer their petition and would e a way for them out of that land to a nge land and another nation, another peoland speaking another language, where they ld make their homes. And when they were led in that land God would send some of our ple (Friends) to visit them; and I have lived ee that all fulfilled this day! And he bowed aged head almost to the earth in thankfulto God. His name was Ivan Machortoff. was as bright and clear in his mind as any we met with."

A Baptized Benevolence.

Our benevolence would be of the highest order e must exercise it out of regard to Him who ied to show mercy to ourselves. Thus our umanity will rise into Christianity, and our enevolence will be baptized into the Name of he Lord Jesus."†

Ve have had before us during the same year ublic appearance of humanity rising into listianity, and the more public exhibition of umanity descending into War. War, by the fession of its own authorities, is the extreme of "man's inhumanity to man;" but that further awful word with which warriors themselves have named War, we will refrain from naming. Yet this contradiction to humanity and to the spirit of Christ has employed the grim irony of putting on the name of humanity as a pretext, and it was defended in religious journals on the plea that it is right to "do evil that good may come." "Whose condemnation," as said the Apostle, "is just."

Thus has been shown the downward course of an unbaptized humanity, a benevolence not baptized into Christ's Spirit, and so not putting on Christ, but rather that most practical outcome of Antichrist, called War; a humanity which, not consistently having the spirit of Christ, is "none of his."

It is of the principle and exercise of carnal warfare that we are saying this, and not of individuals who went into war, being taught even from pulpits, and honestly thinking their course was right. These we judge not. Our purpose is to note the decline and fall of virtuous sentiments whenever their standing and upholding is not in the spirit of Christ. Except as beginning, continued and ending in Him, renewed day by day as fed from the Fountain of his life and love, there is no security that moral ideals will not gravitate earthward, and play into the hands of Satan sooner or later.

Accordingly our very benevolence and love of each other, having its origin and spring at first in Christ's own spirit, stands in jeopardy every hour, when not inspired and held in life under watchful and prayerful dedication "to Him who died to show mercy to ourselves." We being so dipped into Christ as to be imbued with Christ, "our benevolence will be baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus." If we be so risen with Christ as to be seeking those exalted things that are where He sitteth, all our humanity and virtues will rise into Christianity. Our benevolence will become love; our almsgiving, charity; righteousness will be fulfilled, and the lusts of the flesh not fulfilled, in us who walk after the Spirit.

A season is approaching when benevolence and good will will be much spoken of, and the annual interchange of gifts for a set day will be hoped to stimulate the spirit of rivalry in kind deeds. Whatever reminding-day others may need, they to whom Christ is their Day find in his life their constant Christmas, which knows no anniversary because it is a state of their being, a part of themselves and not of a year.

In proportion as people will observe Christ, they will less require to "observe days, and months, and times, and years;" on account of which his eminent apostle was "afraid" for Christians who observed these as shadows of his coming. What virtue can come from a season, to any who will not day by day have it come directly from Christ "in season, out of season?" We are told that "as a season of home-pleasures, of friendly remembrances, of hospitality, benevolence, and good-cheer, wherein the emphasis is laid on making others happy, Christmas can never have a rival." But it should have a rival, even Christ. "For me, to live is Christ." He, not one of whose days we can command, is the Fountain of all that is ascribed to Christmas, and that, too for every day, to keep alive "the love that binds the family together, the delights of home, the affection of friends, the sweet remembrances of absent ones, the kindly provision for the needs of those less fortunate than the donors."

Thus a baptized benevolence knows no day as its specialty, but is determined to know nothing in its calendar "but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified."

"It is more blessed to give than to receive;" for they who rightly give the carnal bread are in that very faithfulness receiving of the spiritual bread, which is far better. Moreover, the recipient receives it of a man, but the giver gives it not only to a man, but, as Christ says, "ye have done it unto me," besides. So the heavenly deed is more blessed than the earthly relief.

The obedient giving of our carnal things—in others words, self-sacrifice—being really a partaking of spiritual things, it becomes a spiritual repast, or Lord's supper, such as Jesus knew of when He said, "My meat and my drink is to do the will of Him that sent me." Also, "As I live by the Father, so he that eateth me (doeth my will), shall live by me."

Thus Christian giving being viewed in the light of a blessed repast, it surely deserves all the devout consideration that we sit in silence to give before an earthly meal. It calls for a waiting on the Lord for a sense of his will, that we may do it and partake of his communion under it. This silent turning unto the Lord that He may say "grace" to us for each meal is as due to Him before every other repast, whether it be the reading of a good book, or receiving a "feast of reason and flow of soul" in social refreshment, or any approach of an engagement of duty; that in whatever way we eat, or drink, or do, it may be done "as unto the Lord." This will be a "watching daily at wisdom's gates," and may deliver us often from giving unworthily, as blind impulse, impatience, policy, or unbaptized benevolence might betray us to do.

First American Patent.

GRANTED AT BOSTON IN 1648 AND CALLED A MONOPOLY.

To the general court of Massachusetts belongs the honor of granting the first American patent. This was in 1648, and was then designated as a monopoly. It was confined to the region controlled by Massachusetts, and the one issue apparently included all the invention of the inventor connected with engines that depended upon water for their motive power. The limit of the monopoly was 14 years, and the court not only retained power to forbid exportation, but to prevent exorbitant charges upon the public for their use.

The patent was issued in this form:

"JENKES MONOPOLYE.

"At a generall Courte at Boston the 6th of the 3th Mo 1648. The cor't consid'inge ye necessity of raising such manifacturers of engins of mils to go by water for speedy dispatch of much worke with few hands, and being sufficiently informed of ye ability of ye petition to performe such workes grant his petition (yet no Othr per sen shall set up or use any such new invention, or trade for 14 yeares wthout ye license of him the said Joseph Jenkes) so farr as concernes any such new invention, & so it shall be alwayes in ye powr of this co'te to restrain ye exportation of such manufactures & ye prizes of them to moderation if occasion so require."

This inventor, Joseph Jenkes, or Jenks, as it would now be spelled, came from Hammersmith, England, settled in Lynn in 1643 and died in 1682–83, aged 81. He was a blacksmith and machinist, made the dies for the coining of the "Pine Tree" money and built the first fire engine in this country, altogether a man of great inventive genius and the ancestor of a large number of descendants. One of his sons removed to Rhode Island, where he built several mills.—Boston Transcript.

CRITICISING BIBLICAL HISTORY.—Is it right to pass judgment finally on the historical facts as set down in the Bible, merely because as yet they do not coincide with history, so far as authenticated elsewhere? We think not. It is the same story as with the too ready acceptance as actual facts of the conclusions of Bible critics. Frequently the result has been that these mere opinions have had to be altered within several years to meet the views of other scholars or newly discovered facts. All this is in such a state of flux that it were well on mooted points to suspend judgment. Many conservative scholars are now finding fault with such as choose to put down as definite facts and conclusions what are merely inferences. Some day these rash scholars will find themselves entombed in their works.—Jewish Exponent.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

At the time of the war between France and England in 1756 to 1763, Friends in Pennsylvania were placed in a position of great responsibility and difficulty. They could no longer consistently retain their connection with the Government which was then, in compliance with the popular demand administered in a manner repugnant to their principles, yet while resigning their positions in the Assembly, their interest in and to a certain extent their influence in public affairs, remained unchanged. This was particularly the case in matters relating to the Indians.

The hasty action of Governor Morris in declaring war against the Delawares, produced a crisis, in which Friends believed themselves required to exert their influence publicly; and as Catharine Phillips remarked "the termination of the war was at last effected by the peaceable interposition of Friends." This was done largely by an Association then formed for the express purpose "of regaining and preserving peace with the Indians by pacific measures." In this capacity Friends were able to render essential service by moderating the revengeful temper of the red men, and promoting a willingness among the white inhabitants to listen to their complaints, and enter into an agreement to do them justice, by steps which finally resulted in treaties of peace.

Proud, in his History of Pennsylvania says on this subject: "The Quakers who, as before observed, had the least share in these public transactions, as to appearance, being, contrary to ancient custom, excluded from the Proprietary agency, by which all treaties and public transactions with (the Indians), in the province, were directed and managed, more especially respecting land affairs, which appeared to be the principal cause of the quarrel, were, nevertheless, in fact, the prime movers of the peace, and the first and chief promoters of redressing the Indians' wrongs or complaints, so far as in them lay, in their restricted capacity."

Daniel Stanton, who was himself engaged in promoting these movements makes the following allusion to them in his Journal. "A great concern having fallen on the minds of a number of Friends, principally in Philadelphia, who freely contributed their money and time, for promoting the restoration of peace with the natives, I believe they were instrumental in the Lord's hand to appease the revengeful nature of so barbarous and cruel an enemy. The hearts of the Indians retaining a great love for the memory of our first worthy Proprietor William Penn, terming Friends his children; I believe they were a great blessing in the hand of God to the government of this Province for the restoration of peace with such an enraged enemy, who had been permitted to be a heavy rod of chastisement in this land. Yet it was remarkable that through the protection of the Almighty, which was as the shadow of a mighty rock in a weary land, few called by our name were ill-used during all this calamity." The steps which led to these efforts, and the formation of this association are detailed somewhat at length in THE FRIEND, Vol. XLVI, pp. 169, etc., and also in Vol. LXXII, pp. 237, etc.

With the exception of a few scattered settlements along the Susquehanna and Lehigh the white inhabitants of the Province in 1756, occupied only the southeastern corner, while beyond a line running from Easton on the Delaware to the Maryland border near Chambersburg, the country was almost an unbroken wilderness, to which the Indian title had not been extinguished. Of much of this territory the six nations, whose seats were in the region now included in Western New York claimed the sovereignity by right of conquest, but it was inhabited chiefly by the Delawares and remnants of the Mohicans, the Nanticokes or tidewater people, originally from the Eastern shore of Maryland, and the Shawnese or Southerners, who in scattered bands had entered the province at different times, and located themselves in widely remote settlements.

In addition to the grievances which the Indians complained of in reference to their land affairs, the injuries which had resulted from the abuses of unprincipled traders and whiskey sellers among them had greatly tended to alienate them from the English, and prepare them to enter into an alliance with the French, who eagerly courted their friendship, particularly of those bands living nearest to the French outposts in the Western part of the Province. Apprehensions of serious trouble from this cause were long felt by those acquainted with the feelings of the Indians, and in 1753, Richard Peters, Isaac Norris and Benjamin Franklin, who had been appointed to attend a treaty at Carlisle, thus allude to it. "We cannot close our report without taking notice that the quantities of strong liquors, sold to these Indians in the places of their residence, and during their hunting season, from all parts of the counties, over Susquehanna, have increased of late, to an inconceivable degree, so as to keep those poor Indians continually under the force of liquors; that they are thereby become dissolute, enfeebled, and indolent when sober, and untractable and mischievous in their liquor, always quarreling and often murdering one another; that the traders are under no bonds, nor give any security for the observance of the laws and their good behavior, and by their own intemperance, unfair dealing, and irregularities will, it is to be feared, entirely estrange the affections of the Indians from the English, deprive them of their natural strength and activity, and oblige either to abandon the country, or submit to any terms, be they ever so unreasonable from the French."

Upon the commencement of hostilities the Delawares and Shawnese living upon the branches of the Ohio, joined the French, and with small companies of disciplined troops committed the greatest barbarities upon the border settlements in 1756 and 1757, causing almost the entire depopulation of certain districts, and spreading terror throughout the whole Province. An expedition had been sent against them in 1757 which destroyed their town of Kittaning, and in 1758 a large army under Gen. Forbes was preparing to march through their country to attack Fort Duquesne, when circumstances occurred which seemed to open the way for an effort to regain their friendship or at least by friendly negotiations to disarm their hostility and detach them from the alliance which they had formed with the French in this desperate struggle for the mastery of the continent.

The establishment of peace with the Northern Delawares under Tedyuscung at the treaties aston in 1756 and 1757, had been followed incere endeavors on the part of this chief, xtend the offers of reconciliation to the es of the northward and westward, who had er joined the French or were wavering in attachment to the English, and frequent nunications passed between him and the orities of the Province in relation thereto ng the year 1758. In the Sixth Month of year Christian Frederic Post and Charles nson, previously a teacher in Friends' School hiladelphia, were sent to the residence of uscung at Wyoming with messages from Governor and General Forbes, and also from Cherokees in the South who had taken up hatchet against the French, counselling not to engage in the war against the ish and to use their influence with their ern brethern to induce them to abandon alliance with the French.

MINISTERING SPIRIT.—One James Smith, English laborer in the navy yard on the nes, had a little boy, Johnnie. James was ry intemperate man. After the death of wife sorrow kept him sober for a while, he took to his cups again, and, as poor nie expressed it, "got badder and badder he time." One night the drunkard awoke, ost uncommon thing for him at such an , and lay very still, for he heard a sound. as his motherless boy praying by his bed-

He heard him say, "Please God, make y a better man, for Jesus' sake." James h could not sleep any more. He rose very and went to his work. He came home that night without having drank a drop quor. His heart was melted. He said to nie, "What put it into your head to pray your worthless old dad?" Johnnie told that it was because he loved him; and be- he had been to a class where the teacher ht him the commandment, "Honor thy er and thy mother." "Prohibition Does Not Prohibit."

Is it true? If so why have brewers and distillers spent hundreds of thousands of dollars for the overthrow of impotent enactments?

The above expression has been so often heard that many believe it to be true.

Edmund Burke recognizing the effect of repetition on the mind, once said that should a man repeat an untruth once daily for a year that at the end of the period he would come to believe that what he had repeated was true. So that many a hoary lie put into the mouths of men by the author of all evil, lives and perpetuates itself by process of repetition.

This particular one has its source in the greed and fear of the liquor traffic, one of the devil's chief agents for the destruction of men. It is enunciated first through the liquor press, and repeated by politicians who want to head off temperance and prohibitory law. It is repeated again by that large class of humanity who are perpetually discouraged, and have come to believe that no large social or political movement for human betterment can ever succeed, and who hold that the world is steadily growing worse; forgetting that "of the increase of his government there shall be no end."

Finally, being so often heard, that other large class who are sincere and righteous men actively working for the uplifting of the human race accept the saying as true; never having searched out the truth of the matter nor considered the source of the falsehood.

Having lived for some time in Iowa before and after the passage of a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicants I can testify that a prohibitory law does prohibit. About twenty saloons had flourished in a town of four thousand near my home and the usual amount of drunkenness and crime was their product. The prohibitory law was not instantaneously successful in closing all of them, but when the officers of the law became active and the courts made the fines overbalance the profits, and sent a few illegal sellers to jail, the traffic finally was effectually stopped. The law prohibited the sale of liquor as surely as the law against theft prevented stealing. Those who sold strong drink and those who committed midnight burglary did so contrary to law and not by its sanction.

Ever since Moses received the ten prohibitory commandments each and all of them have been persistently disobeyed by a few evilly inclined persons in every age, nation and community. The breaking of a commandment does not disprove its worth. The effect of the law on the good order and prosperity of a state is the measure of its value.

In the state of Iowa the decrease of crime was marvellous. At the end of four years after the law was passed, (notwithstanding a few men were still in jail for the selling of rum) yet 53 per cent. of the county jails had not an inmate. Compare this with twenty-eight thousand arrests in one year in high-license Philadelphia, and over fifty thousand arrests annually in high-license Chicago.

Not only did crime decrease in this remarkable manner, but Iowa probably never had a period of more rapid accumulation of wealth. The State was soon able to say that it had no bonded or floating public debt.

Lady Henry Somerset in The Contemporary Review for Tenth Month, throws some light on the question of whether the effect of a righteous law is good or evil; she shows that in the United States, Canada, Norway and Sweden, nations that have had prohibitory legislation over a large part of their territory, the average per capita consumption is 1.74 gallons proof spirits; while in the United Kingdom, Denmark, Germany, Hungary, Belgium, France, Italy, Spain and Switzerland, nations that have made little effort to stop the traffic, the average consumption is 4.85 gallons per head. Then she follows with statistical proof that the wages of national sin is death. The average death rate for the first group of nations is 1.65 yearly in ten thousand, while that of the European group is 2.49 in ten thousand: showing fifty per cent. greater mortality in those nations that have made no serious effort to make liquor selling illegal. Thus over one million more persons die yearly in Great Britain and Continental Europe than would die if their death rate was as low as the more moral nations of the new world where prohibitory legislation had obtained a foothold.

The attitude of the present administration toward the anti-canteen law shows under what conditions Prohibition does not prohibit, viz: when politicians for the sake of the political influence of liquor men pervert by a quibble the plain meaning of the law and read "permit" where the admittedly original intent of the law had been to "prohibit." Against such unscrupulous rendering of the law in high places Christian men should protest by voice and vote.

SILENCE ABOUT OURSELVES.—Think as little as possible about any good in yourself; turn your eyes resolutely from any view of your requirements, your influence, your plans, your success, your following—above all, speak as little as possible about yourself. The inordinateness of our self-love makes speech about ourselves like the putting of a lighted torch to the dry wood which has been laid in order for burning. Nothing but duty should open our lips upon this dangerous theme, except it be in humble confession of our sinfulness before God.

Again, be especially on the watch against those little tricks by which the vain man seeks to bring round the conversation to himself, and gain the praise or notice which his thirsty ears drink in so greedily. Even if praise comes unsought, it is well, while men are uttering it, to guard yourself by thinking of some secret cause for humbling yourself inwardly to God, thinking into what these pleasant accents would be changed if all that is known to God, and even to yourself, stood revealed to you.

Place yourself beneath the cross of Calvary; see that sight of love and sorrow; hear those words of wonder; look at the eternal Son humbling himself there for you, and ask yourself, as you gaze fixedly on Him, whether he whose only hope is in that cross of absolute self-sacrifice and self-abasement can dare to cherish in himself one self-complacent action. Let the Master's words ring ever in your ears, "How can ye believe who receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?"—Bishop Wilberforce.

IN EARNEST.

I think the immortal servants of mankind
Who from their home watch by how slow degrees
The World-Soul greatens with centuries,
Mourn most Man's barren levity of mind—
The ear to no grave harmonies inclined,
The witless thirst for false wit's worthless lees,
The laugh mistimed in tragic presences,
The eye to all majestic meanings blind.

O prophets, martyrs, saviours! ye were great,
All truth being great to you: ye deemed Man more
Than a dull jest, God's ennui to amuse:
The world, for you held purport: Life you wore Proudly, as Kings their solemn robes of state;
And humbly as the mightiest monarchs use.

William Watson in the Spectator.

Selections from the Letters and Memoranda of Robert Milhous.

First Month 17th, 1889.—Another year has passed over, and is gone forever, which causes solemn reflections to my mind, and the query arises under a feeling of great unworthiness, have I done anything toward the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom? Truly the response must be, Nothing to myself. But if anything to his honor, let Him have all the praise, and let the creature be laid low as in the dust before Him. A precious hope, however, revives this evening, that mercy still covers the judgment seat, as to an hair's breadth. Pardoning love and mercy is all I have to trust in and lean upon. "Oh, leave me not in the time of old age," has been very much the intercession of my heart for a length of time past.

Second Month 23rd.—I take up my pen this morning to record the decease of my dear daughter, Lydia, which took place on the morning of the fourteenth instant, about twenty minutes past two o'clock, she being aged forty-eight years, six months and twenty-one days. I thought the precious language of Holy Scripture might in truth be applied to her, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the spirit, they rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

There are four of our family circle only, now left to mourn our loss, yet we do not mourn as those who have no hope, for we rejoice in the belief that she has been gathered out of "great tribulation" into the fold of everlasting rest and peace, her robes having been washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. O Lord, wilt thou be pleased to preserve me, thy poor unworthy worm of the dust, now in my old age, under every trial, even unto the end, and be with me also in passing through "the dark valley of the shadow of death." And I humbly pray thee, preserve the dear partner of my life through all unto the end; and also the dear children be pleased to lead in paths of safety, and preserve them from the snares of our unwearied enemy, so that they may be presented faultless before the throne of thy glory, with exceeding joy.

Fourth Month 16th.—Yesterday I completed my seventy-eighth year. It seems almost marvellous to myself that such a poor, unworthy creature as I am should be spared to this time of life. Surely, I have been a poor, erring one, yet mercy has followed me all the days of my life, and I humbly trust the prevailing desire of my heart is to be found in the way of true obedience to the Divine will concerning me. Oh, if I should be spared another year, I do crave that it might be more devoted to the service of my dear Heavenly Father, however it may be in the cross to my own will. Oh, what an unspeakable favor it is to experience the creaturely will laid in the dust, and the Lord alone exalted, and strength given to go forth in his power and might.

First Month 1st, 1890.—At our little meeting to-day, the language seemed impressively brought to my remembrance, "Gold is tried in the fire and acceptable men in the furnace of adversity," with solemn reflections, respecting the offices of our Holy Redeemer who it is declared in Holy Scripture, "Shall sit as a refiner with fire, and as a purifier of silver," which I believed it right for me to express, accompanied with desires that this purification may have its full effect in my own breast, before the solemn summons comes, "Steward, give an account of thy stewardship."

Twelfth Month 30th.—I feel as though it might be best for me here to refer a little to the visit I paid to the meetings of Kansas Yearly Meeting and in some parts of Iowa, in 1886, and the fears that I then suffered under, lest I had, through yielding to discouragement, left the field laid out for me, too soon. I may acknowledge that I never felt clear of the weight of the concern, until I gave up to visit, in the love of the Gospel, Western Yearly meeting and its branches, in Eighth Month, 1890, it being the portion which I believed I had prematurely passed by. Which I was at last favored to accomplish, to the entire relief and peace of my own mind. May all the praise be ascribed unto Him who bore with my weakness and rebellion so long.

First Mo. 27th, 1891.—At our little meeting to-day, soon after taking my seat, there seemed to be, in mercy granted, a fresh evidence of the Father's love, extended even to me; under which feeling I felt constrained with thankfulness publicly to speak of it, and the comforting language was presented, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." And encouragement seemed to be handed forth to all, to let the time past suffice, wherein we may too much have followed the will of the creature, and to be more entirely devoted to the service of our God, from whom we receive all our blessings, both spiritual and temporal.

Second Month 15th.—Went to meeting today under feelings of discouragement, not feeling very well as to bodily health, together with a feeling of great unworthiness, and on sitting down in our little meeting, my mind seemed to be brought into a feeling of calmness and silence, and a number of young women and men, with several others, not members with us, came in and sat down in an orderly manner, and my mind seemed brought into exercise, particularly for the younger class and the language arose with me, "We have set before us, life and death, good and evil," which I apprehended, I felt called upon to express, together with the declaration that there is no age whatever exempt from the pale messenger of death, and the desire that prevailed with me that the young, and those in the prime of life, might "choose the Lord for their portion and the God of Jacob for the lot of their inheritance," for He loveth an early sacrifice; and thus they would experience Him to be their refuge, and it is the only way to ob tain true and lasting peace; with an exhorta tion to those of us who are advanced in life, t enter into a close examination of ourselves that we may be favored with the evidence o acceptance. With exhortation to this impor I felt peace and the hope to arise in my heart that my feeble offering was accepted. Feel ings, I trust, of thankfulness, in a good degre prevailed.

THE STYLE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—Wha attentive reader has failed to notice the artles simplicity of the New Testament narrative A thought of the manner in which they shoul tell their story, seems never to have entere the minds of the writers. They speak as eye witnesses, and what they have seen and hear they tell in the plain language of every-da life. Yet without effort they avoid everythin coarse or low or trivial. Their style is like stream of pure water flowing over golde sands and precious stones; itself almost i visible, yet revealing all things within i bosom.

This simplicity of the New Testament co vinces us that the gospel was never intende to be a theme for declamation and orator Paul, the most learned of the apostles, ignore the rhetoric of the Grecian and Roman school and gave his testimony concerning Jesus, the common, straightforward speech.

But there is a reason, not often mentione why the New Testament history is so simp and artless—why its writers speak in the la guage of the common people. The doctri which they teach is designed to be a guide every-day life. It is designed to enter into the affairs of men, and be the controlli power of all their actions. The subtleties philosophy and science are for the student the professor; belles-lettres and oratory f the few who have wealth and leisure and cu ure. They belong to the luxuries, not to t necessaries of life. But the gospel is for a Hence it comes to all in the common garb human speech, that it may lay hold of hearts, and become to all the most intimat unrestrained, and natural of friends.—Octograph.

TRUTH DIVINER THAN FICTION.—"Truth wise men tell us, "is diviner than fictio Even a child like you will see that it must so, if you will but recollect who makes ficti and who makes facts. Man makes fiction: invents stories, pretty enough, fantasti enough. But out of what does he make th up? Out of a few things in this great wo which he has seen and heard and felt, just he makes up his dreams. But who mal truth? Who makes facts? Who, but G Then truth is as much larger than fiction, God is greater than man; as much larger the whole universe is larger than the lit corner of it than any man, even the great poet or philosopher, can see; and as mu grander and as much more beautiful, and much more strange.

Be sure that no man can ever fancy a thing strange, unexpected and curious, wi out finding, if he had eyes to see, a hund things around his feet more strange, m unexpected, more curious, actually ready-ma already by God.—From Charles Kingsley.

YORKTON, ASSINIBOIA,
Eleventh Month 19th, 1899.

LLIAM EVANS.

Dear Friend:—Temperature 34°---Returning Fort Pelly from the North Colony on the inst., we found the mail matter deposited re on the outward trip, still being held. It aken to Yorkton once a week, four days ng required to make the round trip. We Pelly in a driving snow storm, just about k, going about six miles to the nearest khobor settlement. The colony was a large and the houses were crowded not a little; were warmly welcomed, and given all the ommodations that could be expected, unique hey were. As the people gathered for the ning meeting, quite a number of men came who had just returned from work; they em- ced and kissed their companions. Next rning we enjoyed the sight of perhaps ten d-looking horses passing the window; this evidence of prosperity, and they seemed e at home, but the money thus spent in stock caused distress in other ways, as will ear later.

The names of the villages seem peculiar, carry with them a meaning. Proterpevshe, he Russian tongue means "much trouble," our hearts were touched when we learned he sufferings; we do not wish to burden nds with a repetition of matter already ated upon. In this village we found twenty ows, eight of whom were in one house, teen of their men were in exile, one woman ing seven sons in banishment; the village presented her with a cow, and in other s showed their appreciation of her worth, sympathy in her affliction. Men were ing logs into planks; a pair of high trestles made, the top being about seven feet from ground; one man stands upon the elevated another on the ground; with a whip-saw make planks and even lighter lumber, ch would do credit to saw mill work.

eritable "dug-outs" were to be found in es; one was seen which sheltered eight sons; there was no window in it; better rters however were being provided. Last st-day morning found us at the old winter rters; a number of persons still remain re, who have not been distributed to the ious villages. We attended their religious vice, which consisted mainly in chanting ms and hymns, interspersed with prayers; etimes two hours is thus spent; the occa- impressed us that a good degree of true itual exercise prevailed during the meeting. one of the villages we met two delegates n each of most of the other villages in the th Colony; the object being the formation community, much the same as the one in e in the North Colony. Advantage was en to gain information concerning the con- on of a few villages, and these were not ted. Joseph S. Elkinton is favored at each pping place to express words of sympathy encouragement, and not unfrequently, a avenly covering has been felt in the assem- s. We are necessarily dependent on our erpreter, in conveying our words, and the lies thereto; he is in sympathy with the k, and having been impressed from the first h their harmonious dealings with one anoth- er, decided to cast his lot near some of them. Among other business transacted at the above mentioned meeting, it was decided to provide a lodging place and stables in Yorkton for the accommodation of the settlers when here for supplies, also to erect a half-way station.

We had a chance the other evening to make a pot of corn meal mush from one of the car loads received, and later partook of bread made from a mixture of wheat flour and corn meal, and it seemed the judgment of our party that it was superior to any other Doukhobor bread that we had tasted. Wheat flour, of fair quality, has been bought for $2.40 per barrel; price since has been advanced a little. Much difficulty is experienced in securing a supply, however, some villages were just out, and numerous others had but five or six barrels; this quantity for villages of perhaps 125 to 175 people, and travel liable to be impeded any day. The timely arrival of the two cars of meal seems a real blessing. We are impressed with the cheerful countenances, and are told that when starvation or affliction are imminent they pray the more earnestly to their Heavenly Father, who always ministers to their comfort.

The Cyprus people, who have suffered perhaps more than any of the others, are hopeful. After being driven about for years in their native country, not being permitted to till the soil, or to earn fair wages, they enjoy the freedom granted here, and their health is decidedly better, though a considerable amount of fever still remains. This, and the scurvy, noticed in so many places, make up most of the cases of sickness, though almost every village has one or more special cases of affliction.

We spent a night and a good portion of the next day with residents of two villages, comprising the first party who came to the territory, something over 300 in number. Picture such a company, whose combined money capital was $200, landed on an uninhabited prairie. They have been at their allotted places about four months; during that time neat sod houses have been built; though very damp, we were made comfortable, and were impressed with the general cleanliness. The head man of the house where we lodged carries on his back marks of the cruel raw hide lash, inflicted in Russia, because he would not fight. We were informed that a body of 60 young men were refusing to enter the Russian army, and, prior to sending them into exile, mounted Cossacks endeavored to rush their horses into them, but in this they failed, the noble beasts refusing to obey their cruel riders.

Among other public improvements, bridges are badly needed; the last crossing of the Assiniboine River was fraught with considerable risk and discomfort; descending a slope of about 45°, we approached the water, making a sudden drop of fully two feet. At one time an upset seemed assured, but we were favored to cross in safety, and to make the steep ascent on the other side. Our drivers seem to have a degree of instinct regarding the trails to be taken; to one unaccustomed, it would be difficult to wind around and through the sloughs and along the tortuous and uncared for courses of travel with any degree of certainty of reaching a certain point.

In Petrofka Orlofka, we found the old patriarch Ivan Machortoff, who, on a former occasion, told J. S. E. of seeing Stephen Grellet in Russia in the year 1818. He said that they prayed to the same Saviour as ourselves,—that if they were favored with a prosperous season, they would show whether they would not be self-supporting. He had served in the Russian army, was in the Crimean war; being convinced that war was inconsistent with Christianity he refused to continue in the service, and suffered a long term in exile. One of his sons is a leader in his village. A seven year old grandson repeated for us in a dignified manner the ten commandments, and another grandson of sixteen told the writer in English that he had been working at railroad construction, making good wages; he seemed very bright and said "Country all right, good."

The last night out was spent with Wm. Macdonald and family, who manifested a kindly interest in our cause. It requires nearly a day to make the trip from that place to Yorkton. We stopped at a ranch for dinner,—there we met the Inspector of mounted police and his brave wife; they had spent between three or four years in the Yukon district; he established the first posts in that far away place and organized the mounted police; they endured there a temperature of 77° below zero. In this northwest territory there are about 1000 of these government officers, who are required to report each day's work, they are practically guardians of the peace, assist in stopping prairie fires, etc. The system seems to be well adapted to the present requirements of the country.

We arrived in Yorkton about five o'clock P. M., quite willing once more to be in touch with railroad, and to hear from our home folks. We have met during our travels, many cases which required careful thought; considerable pecuniary assistance has been rendered, but, among so many we were unable to do as much as would have been desirable. Some of the villages bought too many horses, in fact they so used up their revenue, that, unless helped, starvation seems imminent. When visiting them we were told that in Yorkton, they were counted rich, and were refused the supplies sent by Friends; we did what we could to set things aright. The water supply problem is solved, and pumps, though in some instances desirable, can be dispensed with. Proximity to water seems to have had an undue influence in the location of villages, some are surrounded by rather inferior soil, but located because a body of water is near. It is so near the surface, in some places, that root cellars cannot be dug; but these are not a positive necessity, as the ever present Russian oven serves for warmth and baking, and roots are placed under the wide benches or beds in the houses. In some places the timber question is a serious one, fires have destroyed great forests, and we saw comparatively few trees, and these, mostly small; almost altogether poplar, a few spruce and tamarack. Wood sells in Yorkton at $4 per cord, and Penn'a coal from $10 to $12 per ton. Some maple trees have been planted, but the growth is very slow. When the railroads are further developed, good coal can be secured, but will be expensive.

This railroad construction has been a great help to the Doukhobortsi, enabling the men to earn money to help in support of their families; but the work is being stopped in a number of places, and the stoppage of wages thus earned will be a great disadvantage. Many are already in debt for flour, and their condition appeals strongly to the sympathies and purses of Christian people; They expressed sorrow that they were so helpless and do not wish to be classed as paupers; what they ask is a start in the new life.

The valuable car of sundries from Philadelphia, arrived here two days before our return. It is out of the question for us to remain to attend to the distribution of its contents; we have had numerous interviews with the distributing agents, advising them what to do, and must leave the rest to them. A considerable amount of time has been consumed in tabulating the statistics taken on the trip, both for the benefit of our friends and of the officials here, it is being sent by this mail under another cover.

Our next field of labor is in the Prince Albert district, to which place most of the last shipload of immigrants were taken.

We have no reason to alter the sentiment expressed in notes already sent, that those who know of and have dealings with the Doukhobortsi testify to their sterling character as a people; One is impressed with the great amount of latent energy of character; a force that is eager for employment and that really wants and needs opportunity to get work, for self-help and advancement. The women as a rule are of splendid physique, and can quickly adapt themselves to varying circumstances, either to the heavy employment of drawing timber and sods for building, or to the fabrication of delicate embroidery. Some linen was purchased for them, also colored silks, with the request that the material should be made up into handkerchiefs, etc., to be sold for their benefit.

The Doukhobortsi have endeavored, to the extent of their ability, to express their appreciation of the kindness of Friends; representatives called at our hotel and presented a touching letter, an interpretation of which is enclosed.

Thy Friend
WM. B. HARVEY.

Translation of letter from the Doukhobortsi to the Society of Friends.

To the Friends, from their friends, the Doukhobortsi. God have mercy upon you for your care, love and generosity!

Five years ago, when the Spirit of God inspired our people, and we learned the way of Truth, the way which our ancestors followed, but we lost it. When we again tried to follow that way of Truth, the people of different opinions began to oppress and persecute us, and we were scattered like a flock of sheep, who lost their shepherd. The labor of our hands was destroyed, the fruits of our efforts of many years were taken away from us, and given to others. We were a small flock, and the persecutors a legion, and they laid their hands on us and we did not defend ourselves. Privations and heavy labor exhausted us, and we died from sickness. Then God inspired you to help us, and you, used to attend to the voice of God, came to us. You clothed us, you dressed our wounds, comforted and encouraged us. Then, when you saw that our oppressors did not stop persecuting us you protected us. and under your protection we found the way out of the land of oppression and slavery, to that of freedom and activity. And you continue to show us your brotherly love, seeing no end to the work that our Lord God inspired you with.

You are constantly studying our needs, and your efforts to satisfy our needs are ceaseless. Now what shall we do, not to seem ungrateful? How could we repay your generosity, care and love? The deeds of kindness cannot be repaid by men, but there is a Creator, who does not leave without reward a single cup, offered to the thirsty, and He will never leave you unrewarded for all your goodness which He himself inspired you with.

God have mercy upon you, for your care, love, and generosity!

For the Doukhobors' people, signed,

Is Christianity Making Progress Among the Jews?

In many Jewish circles it is regarded as a well-established fact that no Israelite becomes a Christian except for sordid reasons. Christians, on the other hand, point to such cases as Neander, Pick, Philippi, and others prominent in church and state as evidence of the fact that the Gospel is a power also among "the lost sheep of the house of Israel." A careful statistical study of the problem is found in Nathanael (Nos. 3 and 4), the Mission journal published by Professor Strack, of the University of Berlin. The article, which covers nearly fifty pages, is from the pen of pastor de le Roi, himself a convert, who has published a three-volume work on the subject. The substance is as follows:

Before the present century, both by choice and by necessity, Israel sought absolute isolation from the rest of the natives, and did not seek to enter into the life and development of the people in the midst of whom they lived, preferring to remain a religious communion by themselves, not influencing others nor being influenced by them.

Largely through the efforts of the Philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, this attitude has been changed, and the whole modern Jewish type of life has become something new. Mendelssohn demanded of his fellow religionists that they should become a part and portion of the peoples among whom their lot had been cast, and be not only Jews; but also Germans, French or English. It was thought that such a union could be effected without any detriment to the religious views of the Israelites: but in this respect those who advised the innovation were seriously mistaken. Modern civilization is essentially a product of Christianity, and participation in its best work is possible only by recognition, to greater or less extent, of the principles of Christianity. Moreover, the new attitude of Jews could not but make them more susceptible to the same influences that have given to other peoples their unique type of culture and civilization. In this way the ground was prepared for a greater influence of the Gospel on the Israelites, and this influence of the Gospel on the Israelites has been at work all along with good results.

The only reliable basis, however, for a computation of the extent to which Christian principles have become a factor in modern Jewish life is that of actual statistics. Such statistics are accessible from the Protestant, the Roman Catholic and the Greek Catholic Churches, as also from the many special mission societies and from the official list of converts as reported by the statisticians of Germany. Taking all these services together, and putting only a conservative estimate on their data, we have the remarkable fact that Gospel work among the Israelites has, from the point of numbers, been relatively more successful than among any other people of the world. The summary of the accessions made to the Christian Church from the Israelites since the beginning of the present century, as collected from all the reports of baptisms, is as follows;

Received into the Protestant Church	72,750
Received into the Roman Catholic Church	57,300
Received into the Greek Catholic Church	74,500
Total	204,540

A table of comparisons follows which shows that these figures are increasing each year, and it is becoming more and more apparent that the Protestant type of Christianity is proving more attractive to the Israelites than either of the Catholic churches.

These conclusions are in part corroborated by the figures published in the new annual, the well known Jahrbuch for 1899, of the church of Germany, edited by Pastor J. Schneider, of Elberfeld, which (pp. 202-210) enters fully up on the question, supplementing to a considerable extent the account of Nathanael. From this source we extract the following data: The number of conversions from Judaism to Christianity in Germany has increased right along. Twenty-five years ago the average was about 65, but of late years it has been about 500 and more, most of these taking place in Berlin. Among these converts are many philologists, jurists, and other educated men.—Extract from "The Literary Digest."

For "THE FRIEND."

Turn to the Right.

After I had visited at my friend's house for a few hours and the time came for going home I may have inquired about the best path to follow. At any rate, he walked with me over the hill and through the orchard and across the field past the locust grove and through the clover redolent with the fragrance and the memories of other days, like as in old times when children went part way home with each other, or as in those older times when Jesus pointed out the way for human feet to walk in. "If a man asthee to go with him a mile go with him twain." When we attained the point from which the desirable path was in part visible, we stopped and he pointed out my direction somewhat after this fashion: "Go this way a little, then turn to the right, and cross the valley and then go up over the hill yonder," Then our farewells were spoken and I followed his directions and soon came safely home. But afterward I could but remember his words, and think how fittingly they might apply and be full of meaning in regard to our walking along life's pathway. If any were astray, or in doubt, or in danger, or in need, who would not gladly go with him a little while and say: "Turn to the right, then over and on and up;" and we might not need to add much to make our meaning plain.

EMPEROR NOT CZAR.—While English-speak- persons invariably refer to the head of the ssian Empire as "Czar," this appellation is er used at the court of St. Petersburg, not- hstanding the fact that the word, owing its ivation to "Czar," has a far more despotic nd if not meaning than "emperor." By giv- a little history we arrive at the real differ- e between "Czar" and "emperor" as ap- d to Russia. Up to the time of Peter the at, Russia was composed of divers petty gdoms like Germany previous to the confed- tion. At the head of each of these king- ns was a czar. When Peter the Great united se kingdoms into one great empire he assum- he title, "Emperor and Autocrat of all the ssias," which is still in vogue. If one should e the two highest titles of the present mon- n, he would begin: Nicolas II, Emperor Autocrat of all the Russias; Czar of Mos- , Niji Novgorod, Poland, etc.—Pathfinder.

HE world does not stand in order that we be pleased : it stands as a place for the g of honest work in the best way; and if work can be better done in some other than the one we prefer, our business is to it be done, and rejoice in it.

Items Concerning the Society.

oseph James Neave, from Australia, has been nding some of the meetings in Philadelphia, ecting to proceed, on Fourth-day last, towards winter's field of labor in the compass of Balti- e and North Carolina Yearly Meetings.

letter from Baltimore says that while the e of the Society was under notice in the Yearly ting recently held there, a valuable considera- of "the Pastoral question" came up, during ch a prominent member "made a very strong for the simple methods we have always main- ed, and there was a large expression of unity him."

carload of sugar was shipped from Philadel- to Canada for the Doukhobors during the week. Another car of food and clothing is ut starting, containing 150 sides of leather for s, 500 gallons of cottonseed oil, 4,000 pounds arley, 2,000 pounds of cheese, with several of clothing. As purchases will be made here r in Canada, contributions would better be in ey.

Western Quarterly Meeting, which has hitherto n held at London Grove, Pa., was on Sixth-day 24th instant, held at West Grove, for the better renience of those generally who could resort to It proved to be a comforting and encouraging on; so much so that it seemed good to the ting to authorize the holding of it in the same e at its next stated period also, which will ar Second Month 23d, 1900. The acceptable at- dance of visiting Friends from neighboring rters, and from North Dartmouth, Mass., was reciated.

rancisco G. Cala has written from Cuba that was brought up in the Roman Church, became centiate there, then found out about the Epis- al Church, joined it, but from reading the Bible it was not right; left it, and upon reading ray's "Life of George Fox," was so impressed h his ideas of truth that he and his three hun- l followers have become Friends." He has asked books concerning our doctrines. They have nged the name of their association from the ban Evangelical Church" to the "Society of nds in Cuba."

Notes from Others.

The Queen of the Netherlands is the only Presbyterian monarch in the world.

"THEY SAY."

Have you heard of the terrible family "They,"
And the dreadful, venomous things they say?
Why, half the gossip under the sun,
If you trace it back, you will find begun
In that wretched House of "They."

In these last days, the thoughts of men are largely turned away from the kingdom within, to the kingdom without. The great truths by which sinners are awakened and Christians are edified and sanctified do not occupy the large place they once did. Work has largely superseded faith, and the labors of the hands have taken the place of the searching of the heart. Outward duties are so multiplied and so exacting as to leave little time for the cultivation of personal piety.—Jos. T. Smith.

The total amount of money appropriated by Congress at its last session (aggregating about a billion dollars) would make a cubic block of gold twenty-six and a half feet in each dimension. Its weight would be eighteen hundred and forty-one tons. If set in the middle of an ordinary street there would scarcely be room for teams to drive around it, and the top would reach to the middle of the third-story windows. After all, a millionaire has not much gold. It would make a block with length, breadth and thickness of only about two and a half feet.—Philadelphia Record.

The religion of society, says — Lorimer, is a religion of convenience, while the religion of Christ is one of obligation. The religion of society is a religion of observances; that of Christ is a religion of experiences. The former is a religion of opinion, the latter a religion of revelation. Establish the religion of opinion in your Protestant churches, and in fifty years from now America will be Romanized from one end of it to the other, simply because a man must have something to lean on. The religion of society is one of criticism; that of Christ is a religion of creation."

Christ formed an inward and invisible society, which is one, because it is pervaded by a common life; holy, because it is composed of those who are washed and sanctified; universal, because all who belong to Christ, whether in heaven or earth, belong to it; apostolic, because it accepts apostolic doctrine and spiritual fellowship, and has, under God, been called into existence by the labors of apostolic men. These two societies, the one external and, as we may say, ecclesiastical, and the other visible only to the eye of God, but spiritual and eternal, are spoken of, and thought of, as one by the New Testament writers, the sad necessity of carefully discriminating the one from the other not having yet arisen.—W. Hay Aitken.

Correspondence.

West Branch Quarterly Meeting of Friends (conservative) held at Stavanger, Iowa, Eleventh Month 19th, 1899.

Having once more been permitted to meet in a Quarterly Meeting capacity, a feeling of thankfulness arose in our minds to our dear Heavenly Father for the many blessings received, both spiritually and temporarily, and although we feel that we are few in number and weak in the faith, yet we feel that we are not forsaken by the Great Head of the Church, but are still remembered by Him, as we have the company of our beloved friends, Benjamin P. Brown, of North Carolina, and Eli H. Harvey, of Indiana; and we can truly say we have never attended such a meeting. Things both new and old were brought forth. The faithful were exhorted to be steadfast and immovable, abounding in that love which knows no bounds. The careless were encouraged to more concern for the salvation of their souls and to be willing to make a full surrender unto Him who is the way, the truth, and the life; and not to put off the visitations of heavenly love, but to look to the still, small voice, assured that the kingdom of God was within them. Mothers were exhorted to endeavor to watch over and care for and bring up the precious children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, that the greater responsibility rested upon them, and the fathers were exhorted to be true helpmates to them and to endeavor to lighten their burdens, which were often heavy. The dear youth were exhorted to give up their young hearts to serve the living God, and the language was quoted: "Know thou the God of thy fathers, and serve Him with a perfect heart and a willing mind, for if thou seek Him he will be found of thee; but, if thou forsake Him, He will cast thee off forever." The skeptics were warned to flee from the wrath to come; that "the wicked should be cast into hell and all the nations that forget God." Oh, it did seem that the very windows of heaven were opened, and marvellous to us was the manifestation of the spirit and power of Him who is from everlasting to everlasting, and whose dominion is even to the ends of the earth. We were reminded of early days in the society when it was said that in one meeting the floor was wet with the tears shed, for they flowed freely, and we can truly say such as we never saw before, and we believe much good has been done hereaway; yes, we believe in many hearts arose petitions for a closer walk with God, and we also believe from the sinner went up the cry, "God be merciful to me!" May the good seed sown take root downward and bring forth fruit upward to the praise of the Great Head of the Church, for He alone is worthy.

The writer had the privilege of accompanying dear B. P. Brown in visiting 42 families in this neighborhood, and surely he was much favored to speak to the different states and conditions of the people, and long will the writer remember the many precious opportunities we had. Oh, it seems to us that this is a work that has been greatly neglected of late, that of visiting families, and our poor hearts are made to rejoice that the dear Master is still qualifying and equipping at least a few of his servants for this great work. We visited one dear young woman, who was a great sufferer, having that dreaded disease, consumption, and in the last stage of it. Though a great sufferer, she was trusting in the Lord, and said she had a bright hope of eternal life. She said she had been a great sinner, but through mercy we believe God had pardoned all. She remarked to one that she had been in the practice of attending dances, which she bitterly condemns, and our visit seemed to do her good. Now, dear ones who may read this, she had to come just as we all must, to the foot of the cross and plead for mercy. Oh, don't put off a preparation for eternity until it is everlastingly too late. Now is the accepted time; to-day is the day of salvation.

We do earnestly crave that this, our dear brother, may be enabled to accomplish the remainder of his visit to the honor of Him who we believe has called him, and that he may be enabled to return home to his precious family in peace. And in thinking of the sweet fellowship we have had together with these dear ministers, this language comes to us:

"Blessed be the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love,
The fellowship of kindred minds for earth and heaven above."

LA GRAND, Iowa, Eleventh Month 27th, 1899.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Vice President Hobart died on the morning of Eleventh Month 21st at his home in Paterson, N. J. He had been unconscious since midnight. The funeral was held on the 25th, and attended by the President, members of his Cabinet, Supreme Court, Senators and Representatives.

Postmaster General Charles Emory Smith, in a general order formally declared all mail matter passing between the United States and Porto Rico, the Philippine archipelago and Guam, or between these island possessions of the United States, subject to the United States domestic classification, conditions and rates of postage.

The United States has declined to accept the Anglo-German agreement as to the disposition of the Samoan Islands, and has submitted a draft of a treaty which it is hoped will be acceptable.

Frank A. Vanderslip, assistant Secretary of the Treasury, says in the Saturday Evening Post: "Much reason for our prosperity is to be found in the substantial basis on which the currency rests. It is a foundation of gold, and a foundation broader and wider by a vaster amount than we have ever had before. The volume of gold in the Treasury is now the largest it has ever been, and at the same time the volume of gold in the banks and in the hands of the people is unprecedented. The total gold in the country to-day stands at $1,000,000,000, which contrasts with $641,000,000 three years ago. Gold is becoming the everyday money of commerce, and is no longer found only locked up in banks and safe deposit vaults. In the year just closed nearly 40 per cent. of the payments to the Government were made in gold."

There are nearly 500 water power electric plants in the United States, representing an investment of over $60,-000,000; horse power represented by the water wheel, 200,000. There are 600 miles of street railway operated with water power electrically transmitted.

The total immigration to the United States during the last four months was 115,276, an increase over that of the corresponding period of last year of 30,544.

Although the Pan-American Exposition, which is to be held in Buffalo in 1901, is a year and a half distant, the New York Central Railroad has already begun to advertise the event, and has named one of its fast trains "The Pan-American Express." It has issued a pamphlet describing the inception and object of the exposition, and giving an interesting collection of facts about Buffalo. From this it appears that Buffalo, with 400,000 inhabitants, is the fifth shipping city in the world, has the largest breakwater and the largest coal trestle (the Lackawanna), in the world, 3,500 manufactories, employing 100,000 operatives; 29 different railroads, with 250 passenger trains every day; electric power supplied by the Niagara Falls tunnel; 184 places of worship, 60 public schools, 24 banks, 220 miles of asphalt streets (more than Paris, London, or any other city); 939 acres of parks and 40 grain elevators, holding nearly 21,000,000 bushels.

The Willingham bill, providing for State prohibition, was passed by the Georgia House of Representatives of the General Assembly, Eleventh Month 22nd, after an exciting debate. If the bill passes the Senate and becomes a law it means the annihilation of the saloons. Every plant for the brewing of beer or the manufacture of whiskey must be closed. It will not interfere with banquets or private entertainments, but the law will not allow any club to sell or keep for the use of members intoxicating liquors, beers or wines.

The American Jewish Year Book, just issued, gives the Jewish population of the country as 1,043,800. It is stated that of these there are 400,000 in New York, 95,000 in Illinois, 95,000 in Pennsylvania, 50,000 in Ohio, 35,000 in California, 35,000 in Maryland and 35,000 in Missouri.

It is probable that Southern California will ship out fifteen thousand carloads of oranges this season.

What is claimed to be the largest mushroom house in America is being built on the John Wyeth farm in Westtown township, Chester Co., Pa. It is of brick, one story, 88 by 116 feet. It will be equipped with four tiers of beds for the cultivation of mushrooms, giving a total area of 196,653 square feet for this purpose. The spawn to be used will be imported from England, being much cheaper than that produced in this country. The beds are planted twice each year.

A portion of the town of Cotulla, sixty miles west of San Antonio, Texas, was washed away by a cloudburst early on the morning of Eleventh Month, 24th. Four inches of rain fell in thirty minutes. A merchant named Walker and his wife were drowned. Many buildings were wrecked, and great damage to live stock and ranch property in the vicinity was done.

A despatch dated Eleventh Month 22d, from Baltimore, says: The Donaldson Line steamship Lokania, Captain McNeill, arrived at this port to-day with the crew of the British steamship Manchester Enterprise, which foundered on November 15th, 480 miles southeast of Cape Race. The rescued number 53, of whom 9 are cattlemen returning from Liverpool. The Manchester Enterprise sprung a leak during a severe gale on November 13.

According to a despatch from Plattsburg, N. Y.: During the deer hunting season just ended in the Adirondacks, twenty-two persons were accidentally killed by hunters. The number of deer killed was also larger than usual.

There were 386 deaths in this city last week, which is 21 more than the previous week and 63 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 190 were males and 196 females: 50 died of consumption; 41 of heart diseases; 39 of pneumonia; 24 of diphtheria; 18 of inanition; 17 of apoplexy; 14 of cancer; 11 of debility; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 10 of paralysis; 10 of nephritis, and 9 of inflammation of the brain.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 101½ a 102; 4's, 113 a 113½; new 4's, 132½ a 132¾; 5's, 111 a 111½; 3's, 109½ a 109¾.

COTTON was firmer last week, advancing ⅛c. in sympathy with New York, closing on a basis of 8c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.25 a $2.40; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 a $3.35; Western winter, straight, $3.25 a $3.50; spring, straight, $3.35 a $3.65; city mills, straight, $3.30 a $3.50. RYE FLOUR.—$3.50 per barrel for choice Penna.; Western, $3.30 a $3.45, as to quality.

BUCKWHEAT FLOUR.—New, $2.35 a $2.50 per 100 pounds, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 69½ a 70½c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 38½ a 38¾c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 32c.

FOREIGN.—General Buller reports a fight at Mafeking, on Eleventh Month 6th, in which the Boer and British forces lost heavily.

Reports are made public in London of several recent engagements between the British and Boers in South Africa. In one at Belmont there were heavy losses, the casualties footing up 220, but a complete British victory was gained. There has been sharp fighting at Kimberly; at Mooi River, in Natal Colony, the Boers shelled the British camp, and Joubert's forces are still marching southward, their objective points being Pietermaritzburg and Durban, to check the advancing British reinforcements. Ladysmith and Estcourt are still invested.

The British War Office issued a bulletin Eleventh Mo., 26th, telling of a severe engagement ten miles north of Belmont in Cape Colony between Lord Methuen's forces and the Boers. The action lasted four hours, and the heights were stormed by the British, and the losses in killed and wounded on both sides were heavy.

Late arrivals from Pretoria estimate the Boer war casualties at one thousand men, half of whom were killed.

The Kimberley mines are located in British territory, just outside the boundaries of the Orange Free State, about 600 miles from Cape Town, and supply 98 per cent. of the diamonds of commerce. The existence of these mines was unknown prior to 1867, and since their discovery $350,000,000 worth of rough diamonds have been taken from them, and after cutting the stones were easily worth double. The output of the mines is kept down, so the world's market may not be overstocked.

A special despatch from Vienna reiterates the report, which was denied last week, that the Russians had occupied Herat.

Russian explorers are now busy in several sections of Siberia. Large stretches of that country are still practically unknown to Europeans.

Russia's 8,644,100 square miles of territory extend over one-seventh of the earth's surface. Its waters cover 293,04 square miles. It has fifteen seas to every square mile, or 130,000,000 inhabitants. One-twelfth of the world's population pays tribute to the Czar. It has 11,-000,000 men able to fight. It can send 1,255,300 men into the field in a few days and 1,000,000 a few days later. Its total prepared fighting force is 2,500,000 men and 497,415 horses. The Government owns 16,651 miles of railroad; private parties, 8,000 miles. It has a fleet consisting of twenty-three battleships, fourteen coast defenders, sixteen cruisers, twenty-eight cannon boats and ninety-six torpedo boats. The marine forces are made up of 1,249 officers, 326 engineers, 38,000 men. Its commercial marine consists of 522 steamers and 2,135 sailing vessels. The river shipping has a fleet of 20,000 ships, manned by 90,350 men.

Bautista, President of the Filipino Congress, surrendered himself to General MacArthur, Eleventh Mo. 24th, and formally renounced all further connection with the insurrection. He says the Filipino Congress and Cabinet are scattered, never to reassemble. General Otis cables that "claim to government by the insurgents can be made no longer under any fiction; its Treasurer, Secretary of the Interior and President of Congress in our hands; its President and remaining officers in hiding" and its troops scattered.

Buen Camino, Secretary of State in the so-called Filipino Cabinet, is a prisoner in Manila, having been captured by General Wheaton's men in the Lingayen region.

The last Filipino council of war held at Bayambang just before Aguinaldo's fight "recognized the fatality of attempting further resistance to the Americans with united forces, and agreed that the Filipino troops should scatter and hereafter follow guerilla methods."

General Otis reports that the conditions in the Island of Negros are encouraging. The chief insurgent leader in the north of the island has surrendered voluntarily, and more sugar mills are at work than at any time since the the revolution against Spain began.

Admiral Watson cabled from Manila, Eleventh Mo., 26th, news of the unconditional surrender of the entire Provi of Zamboanga to Commander Very, of the Castine, November 18.

Three hundred Spanish prisoners who escaped from Filipinos have arrived at Manila during the past we The Filipinos have evacuated Mangataarem, in Pangasin province, leaving seven American and ninety-four Span prisoners.

A special to the Public Ledger of the 23d, says: "Cuban wreckers, who have been employed during the l six months in stripping the Spanish war vessels destro by the Americans in the battle off Santiago, are repo to have found $190,000 in Spanish gold in the cru Almirante Oquendo. This gold was found in the Oqu do's safe, which fell to the bottom of the ship when vessel was burned. The safe was opened by divers y terday. They had constructed a shaft, being unable raise the safe. More than $100,000 worth of brass copper has been taken from the Almirante Oquendo, Vizcaya, the Christobal Colon and the Furor. Wreck of the last two is now in progress."

The gold output for the Cariboo district, B. C., this y is estimated at $1,000,000. Extensive hydraulic pla are operated by several companies, and a great deal mining machinery is taken into the district. Some $ nuggets were found this season.

How many psalms of praise with "harp, or ubrel, or stringed instrument" would David ve sung if his praise had been inspired by instruments? In which of the psalms is rship called for as the product of an instru nt, or sound, or voice? And many are taught this day to regard that product exhilarating senses, as worship and inspiration.

"OUT OF THE STRONG CAME FORTH SWEETss." (Judges xiv: 14).—While viewing in nton last week the first cannon fired in our il war, we heard a friend remark that he ently saw at Gettysburg a cannon containg a bees' nest, and the bees passing in and in the process of making honey.

The sweetness which may follow a war is no oduct of the cannon, but in the silence of ans is brought in by Him who maketh even he wrath of man to praise Him." So may E whose gospel would "beat our swords into ow-shares," convert our cannon into beeres!

AN APPEAL TAKEN FROM THE OUTWARD TO THE INWARD.—Immediately following the same casion, a boy came up and asked for a match. he Friend approached was about to hand him ce, when he observed in the boy's hand a cigr. Withdrawing the match he protested, don't propose to aid thee by a match in the soking of a cigar." Then, as by a sudden spiration, the aspect of the Friend changed. tending his hand to the boy he said, "now tce this match! and if thou has manhood ough to resist smoking, just resist it, and be anan!"

It was felt that there was a place in that rticular boy for an appeal from a merely echanical postponement, to an inward witness hich he could respect. The response in his anged countenance gave a hope that this was not a case of casting "pearls before swine." In most other cases such a mode of proceeding might have been felt as an unwarranted risk.

But it requires a Divine wisdom in us to teach boys how to use liberty. On the day following the above incidents, we listened to a discussion on the transition from school life to the sudden freedom of college life in a city, a liberty for which very many are all unprepared. Unnurtured to inward control in liberty, many are not slow to turn it to license. We have heard of upper classes at Westtown school being allowed training-practice in self-government. Wisely and watchfully administered this nurture would forestall the harm of the comparatively unguarded liberty into which the boy is often plunged out of home into city or college life. But it is a fault in colleges if a boy's early liberty in them is so unguarded of tutors and governors, and a fault in schools leading up to colleges if they are not as highly concerned to prepare hearts for college liberty, as heads for college learning. The two conditions should shade off into each other, both ways, so as to leave the least possible transition to be felt, and only as youth is able to bear it. Schools probably are doing this enough, as regards the allowing of "Senior privileges," but are they doing all they can in education in the moral use of liberty, in cultivating a sense of responsibility for the liberty of after life? On the other hand we are far less assured that colleges are duly concerned lest this liberty of theirs "become a stumblingblock to them that are weak." Haverford was founded as an exception. We believe its caretakers still hold this concern at heart, though under changed conditions and expressing itself in changed modes. On these we are not prepared by knowledge to comment with authority. In all schools under or professing our name it is not easy to judge how much the spirit of a guarded education has changed with the letter. The concern to guard it from within rather from without, while it places the emphasis where Truth would place it, leaves occasion for Truth to say, "This ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."

We rejoice that a spirit has found entrance in the most venerable college in our land (and perhaps in others), to meet the new comers part-way in protecting them from their puerile inexperience of life. Committees of the two upper classes have voluntarily undertaken to assign to their members a fraternal oversight concerning the several freshmen's guidance and general welfare. In our own Society's membership the faithful exercise of such a spirit in watching over one-another for good might long since have silenced in advance the cry for paid pastors.

An habitual attention to the Spirit of Christ and his inward checks and reproofs of instruction, which we trust the caretakers of all our schools are in a measure concerned to inculcate, would train a child in that true liberty of the Spirit which is a safeguard against the license of the creature. In Christ alone are men fit for freedom.

The Possibilities of a True Friend in 1899.

The reprint in our present number of a biographical notice of Eliza Wigham, formerly of Edinburgh, has been commended to us by a Friend who, as a stranger from America, was led to feel evidences throughout that city of the savor of her spirit. Though almost an isolated Friend, or connected with a meeting of but scanty members, she was sustained in exerting a far-reaching influence by no props of membership, of wealth, or of extraordinary natural abilities, but only by the power that is the portion of those who keep their eye single to Christ and blind to self. Modestly but unswervingly consistent with the witness for Truth in her own heart, and with the doctrines of our religious Society, she became prominently identified with many concerns of mercy, uplifting, and good for the inhabitants. In all these institutions her quiet judgment seemed by common consent to be accorded a large place. Her gracious character was felt, left its abiding impress, and made her perhaps the best known and most sincerely respected personality in all the town. Our traveller was told that any one in Edinburgh could tell him where to find Eliza Wigham. The first person inquired of at once directed him aright; the next man applied to at random was equally clear in telling him where she lived. When duty called her to remove to Ireland, her fellow-citizens presented her with a memorial amounting to five thousand dollars. This she humbly accepted, and forthwith invested it for a benevolent object in the same city.

One more seal to the promise: "Ye shall receive power after the Holy Spirit is come upon you." Such Friends, widely influential in their humble singleness of purpose, as Ebenezer Worth and Joseph Rhoads, were often pointed out as instances of the declaration that "one honest and faithful Quaker would shake the country for ten miles around." Those whose eye is on the Master, need not, any more than Eliza Wigham needed, a Monthly Meeting to set them to work. They know his secret directions, and follow Him; and so they "walk not in darkness, but have the light of life." Their very singleness of heart which may be called narrow, is the secret of a more widely spread usefulness than any that their critics can boast in their broadness.

As we take the above remarks to press, the arrival of the London Friend, containing the following reminiscence, adds its testimony to the value of the appearance of a Friend that is a Friend indeed :

Nearly twenty years ago, I was riding upon the knifeboard of an omnibus in the environs of Edinburgh, in company with a Friend still living. By our side sat two well-dressed young women, who might have been better-class domestics or shopwomen, full of life and glee. All at once, going cityward, appeared our late dear friend Eliza Wigham, with that purposeful look and step that was hers.

No doubt surprised and amused by the antique costume, the girl next me cried out quite loudly, "Look at that one! Now what's she anyway?"

But her companion very quickly answered, "Hush! that's the Quaker!"

"The Quaker; and what's the Quaker?"

Then came from her companion such a description of the goodness and the grace of our dear friend—her love to poor girls, her care for the wretched and forlorn and downtrodden and degraded—that one could but fancy from her earnest tones that she herself had been a recipient in some shape. There was no more laughing; speaker and hearer were solemnized as at church.

For me, I had a big lump in my throat and brimming eyes of joy at Christ's work by his handmaid. Never has memory turned over this page but the same lump comes back, and the same joy, and longing for more such "The" Quakers, and fewer who are merely "A" Quaker. This quarter of an hour was the happiest of a long and pleasant trip.

WILLIAM SMITHE.

The New Speaker on War.

General D. B. Henderson, of Iowa, will tomorrow, says the New York World, of the 2d instant, be elected Speaker of the House of Representatives. Following is the speech made by him at a soldiers' gathering in Chicago, Ninth Month 12th, 1893. His fervid rhetoric and forceful facts are timely, in view of the official record that our losses in the Philippine war, which was never proclaimed or authorized by Congress, have been in killed, wounded and missing fully 3000, while the Filipinos have sacrificed at least 20,000 in their struggle for freedom.

While to the mind of a Friend the next to the last paragraph of his protest gives away a large part of an entirely Christian standpoint, we prefer to print his words entire :

Mr. President: My theme to-day is war, and I am against it. I wish I had all the gifts to speak my abhorrence of war.

Art, poetry, romance and history have magnified and glorified the soldier, but the time is coming when these great instruments of power will desert their favorite theme and lead the great forces of thought away from the slaughter house up to the higher fields of human action.

The bull fight, the cock pit, the prize ring and the battle field must all go down together.

It takes courage, I grant, to face death. The sufferings and the trials of the soldiers have not been exaggerated. But the courage needed to face danger and death ranks far below the courage that faces the superstitions, the prejudices, the wealth and the established customs of the world.

The great man reasons, the small man fights.

Grant's words of peace will survive his mightiest war cry.

The cost of war alone should make us stop and think.

The public debts of the world are twenty-nine billions, and it is safe to say that every dollar of this is the fruit of war. What a strain upon earth, shops and fields!

In one hundred years Great Britain has paid $4,792,206,000 for war. During these 100 years fifty of them were devoted to human slaughter.

The cost of our own Civil War was $6,508,429,909.

Young as we are as a nation, we have spent eighteen long years in battle—four of them in deadly fratricidal strife. To-day the genius of our country, indeed, of the world, is bending all its powers to increase the capacity for destruction of all the terrible engines of death. Is it not high time that each citizen became a Nazarene to proclaim peace among the people? Let every martyr's grave be a sermon and every widow's wail a hymn for peace

Let us cut down our Army bill and save our earnings for the school house, the library and the home.

Europe is expending on her armies $814,000,000 annually.

No wonder the children of the Old World have been seeking a new home!

Should humanity weep in order that tyrants may laugh?

Should the homes of the people be loaded down with billions of debt in order that some heartless murderer may wear a diadem?

The wretches that have wrought this desolation are the panthers, the hyenas and the ghouls of humanity.

I appeal to you, brave men of many battles, who have seen and felt and comprehended! I cry out to you to throw your influence into the scales and urge the world to seek some forum where the arbitrator shall not be the dripping sword.

War is demoralizing.

War is desolating.

War consumes the toil and comfort of our people.

War is the world's terrible, relentless, remorseless inquisition.

War is the weapon of tyrants, the prop of thrones.

War, the black pathway to hell, has been the pretended passage to heaven.

War has been justifiable, perhaps, and may be again, as sometimes is the surgeon's knife, but only to save life or something better and dearer than life.

Let the time soon come prayed for by the poet:

Till the war drum throbbed no longer,
And the battle flags were furled
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world;
There the common sense of most Shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

If you wish to see things clearly, and to be just with your fellow-men, keep clear of the fumes of vanity, and the thick atmosphere of mere personal feeling.

Friends and the Indians of Pennsylvania

During the interviews which C. F. Post a Charles Thomson had with the Delawares Wyoming, several of the Western Indians fr the Alleghanies were present, who, after he ing the messages delivered, and the assuran of C. F. Post of the friendly feelings of t English were much affected, and Kutaikund, aged chief "lifting up his hands to heav wished that God would have mercy on th and help them, and bring them and the Engl again together, and establish an everlasti ground and foundation of peace between the He wished further that God would move t governors and peoples' hearts towards them love, peace and union; for he hoped with fail that a firm and everlasting peace wo be established and an end put to all war a strife. He said further that it would be w if the governor sent somebody with them their return home, for it would be of gre consequence to them who live about Allegha to hear the Governor's mind from their o mouths."

Upon the return of C. F. Post and Char Thomson to Philadelphia, accompanied by so of these Indians, Friends exerted themsel to induce the Governor to embrace the opp tunity to strengthen the favorable disposit thus expressed. This was finally resolved up and a message prepared to be delivered amo the Western Delawares by a special messeng

The person selected for this dangerous jo ney was Christian Frederic Post, whose kno edge of the Delaware language, integrity character, and extensive acquaintance am the Indians rendered him especially quali for the undertaking. He was a native of Po Prussia, but as one of the Moravian brethr had lived and labored among the Wampano in Connecticut, one of whom he had marri His second wife was a Delaware Indian. Christian character is illustrated by the follo ing incident. In one of his journeys to W oming in company with Charles Thomson, t route lay through a country infested by hos Indians, by whom several murders had h committed in the neighborhood of the path the forest through which they were then tr elling. At night they were obliged to enca in the woods, and lying down under a sens their danger Charles Thomson expressed fears to his companion, who calmly repl "My Saviour watches over me," and went concernedly to sleep.

C. F. Post started on his journey on the teenth of Seventh Mo., 1758, and accompa with Indian guides, on the twelfth of the lowing month arrived at Kushkushkee in neighborhood of Fort Duquesne. He was ceived with great kindness by several of t hostile Indians, by whom he was protected f the murderous designs of the French, and veyed from one of their Indian settlement another, in order to deliver his message, assure them of the friendly feelings of English. As it was known however, to the dians that the army of General Forbes then on its way towards their country, s feelings of doubt in regard to the sincerit the English induced them to hesitate on giv a final answer, and they informed the messe that if he "had brought news of peace be e army had begun to march, it would have ne a great deal more good."

A simple narrative of his two journeys to Ohio was kept by C. F. Post, and was first nted in London with notes in 1759. It has o been printed as an appendix to Proud's story of Pennsylvania. In a recent work en- ed "An Essay towards an Indian Biblio- aphy," in the library of Thomas W. Field, 73, the following notice of this labor of love been recorded: "Since the days of Regulus more perilous mission had been undertaken a single man; Braddock had been defeated eight hundred white soldiers slain. Forbes preparing for the invasion of the Indian ritory. Pitiless massacre reigned on both es, Rewards that would have tempted all fierce borderers a year before were of- ed in vain, until Christian Post, rejecting all er of compensation and solely for peace and rcy's sake, set out upon his mission. Every through the wilderness, the most appall- dangers threatened him. A hundred times e savage arms raised to destroy him, and a dred times by little less than miracles the vs were averted. It is impossible to ex- erate the importance of the work he ac- plished. By his persuasions he detached Ohio Indians from the French interest, and empire of that nation in the West fell."

n the journals of Daniel Stanton, John rchman, John Pemberton, and John Wool- , who were actively engaged to a greater ess degree in labors for the welfare of the ans of Pennsylvania, may be found many resting references to them at this period. as the concern of these and other Friends ttend public treaties, in which the interests he Indians were involved, for many years, in r to assist if possible in their behalf.

n 1760 a band of Delaware Indians resided Wyalusing on the banks of the north branch he Susquehanna, now in Bradford County, Among these was John Papoonung, one heir chiefs. He became a religious man visited Philadelphia in 1760, with several is people, and had interviews with Friends m he found living in the profession of much he had been convinced of without instru- tal means by Divine openings upon his l. To some of these he unfolded the con- s of spirit which he had passed through, on his own account and for the good of eople; among whom he was much esteemed n instructor in spiritual things.

1761, he with other Indians were present treaty at Easton, which some Friends from adelphia also attended. He afterwards came is city and became further acquainted with nds.

1763 John Woolman visited these Indians he Susquehanna, accompanied by Benjamin in, in the love of the gospel, and had sev- religious opportunities with them, in one hich John Woolman was engaged in prayer. eference to this John Woolman says: "Af- ards, feeling my mind covered with the t of prayer, I told the interpreters that I d it in my heart to pray to God, and be- d if I prayed aright, He would hear me, expressed my willingness for them to interpreting; so our meeting ended with gree of Divine love. Before the people out, I observed Papoonung, a man who been zealous in laboring for a reformation in that town, being then very tender, spoke to one of the interpreters, and I was afterwards told that he said in substance: "I love to feel where words come from."

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

This Warm Hearted World.

The last time that Frances E. Willard spoke to a Washington audience, she told of a Chicago bootblack who, with his kit on his shoulder and a package of newspapers under his arm, stopped at the call of a man with a club foot. He worked away at the man's shoes, giving them as fine a polish as he could, and when the job was done the man threw him double pay, saying: "No change; I made you more work than most folks do."

Quick as a flash the little fellow handed back half the money, saying with eyes full of earnest sympathy: "O, mister, I couldn't make money out of your trouble."

Not far from Washington there lived a boy who has to bear the heavy burden of deformity, but so bravely does he bear it that he is the very heart of his home, the brightest and cheeriest and most helpful one in the household.

A while ago he went out and hunted up a situation for himself so that he might pay his share of the family expenses.

Somebody asked him: "Don't you find it rather disagreeable, going about as you have to now?"

He looked up with his bright, flashing smile, and answered quickly: "O, no; everybody is kind to a fellow in my fix," with a slight gesture towards his back.

There is plenty of love and sympathy in the world, after all, if our eyes are open to see them.—Christian Endeavor World.

Plants that Seem to Reason.

"My daughter, who is very fond of flowers, has a morning glory vine growing in a box on her window ledge. While watering it recently, she noticed a delicate tendril reaching out toward a nail in the side casing. She marked the position of the tendril in pencil on the wood, and then shifted the nail about an inch lower. Next day the little feeler had deflected itself very noticeably, and was again heading for the nail. The marking and shifting were repeated four or five times, always with the same results, and finally one night the tendril, which had grown considerably, managed to reach the coveted support, and found it coiled tightly around it. Meanwhile, another bunch of tendrils had been making for a hook that was formerly used for a thermometer. Just before it reached its destination, my daughter strung a cord across the window sash directly above. It was a choice then, between the old love and the new, and as a morning glory always seems to prefer a cord to anything else, it wasn't long in making up its mind. In a very few hours the pale, crisp little tendrils—which, by the way, convey a surprising suggestion of human fingers—had commenced to lift toward the twine. Next day they reached it, and took such a firm grip that I don't believe they possibly could have been disengaged without breaking the fibre. Scientists are no doubt familiar with such phenomena, and, if so, I would be very glad to learn whether they have formulated a theory on the subject. To me it seems simply inexplicable."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Eliza Wigham.

The death of Eliza Wigham removes a charming personality, and one whose life was indeed an example from many points of view. It is not easy for Friends in England to fully understand what sort of place she filled in the midst of the small group of members of the Society in Scotland, as well as in the civic life of Edinburgh. I use the word "civic" because although Eliza Wigham occupied no municipal or official position, she was in a wonderful degree one of the leading citizens of Edinburgh. She was a zealous politician, and this, coupled with her active interest in a large number of social and religious societies, brought her into contact with a variety of persons, and opened up many spheres of influence. Her name was a household word, and her life was seen and read of all men.

A number of cases come to my mind in which Eliza Wigham played the part of the good Samaritan, and in not a few cases continued to play that part over a long period of time. Her generosity and hospitality seemed to know no bounds. Her physical frame grew frailer and weaker, but her spirit grew ever stronger and larger. One forgot the physical frailty, and thought only of the spiritual beauty, and strength and capacity. In one sense she also did the same. That is, she attempted many things altogether beyond her physical strength, and yet she carried them through by the immense force of her spiritual power.

One can scarcely say so much without adding a word concerning, perhaps, the most remarkable case in point. She lived, as many will remember, with her mother, the late Jane Wigham, who during her last years required much careful nursing and tending. To enter that home and watch those two lives in the evening of their days, and witness the absolute self-renunciation of Eliza Wigham, her constant watchfulness, her superhuman patience and gentleness, was a religious education. She gave her life away day by day, she grew more and more weary, and more and more devoted. When the end at last came Eliza Wigham must have slept for days from sheer physical exhaustion. I have seen many nursings. Never one like that. Yet it was an epitome of her life. Her home was a refuge for the distressed, or the homeless, or the unfortunate. Her heart was large enough to take in all sorts and conditions of men and women. She belonged to the Society of Encouragers.

In her political associations, however vigorous her views, they were invariably expressed moderately and quietly. And of those who differed strongly from her, and had perhaps so expressed themselves in public, she always spoke with respect and without a touch of bitterness. Her knowledge of the municipal affairs of Edinburgh was intimate and extensive. I well remember a visit to Duncan Maclaren, and the little council of war concerning a pending election. It revealed something of the wide knowledge which the two Friends possessed and of the wide influence they could exert. Nowadays in Edinburgh there are plenty of women prepared to stand in the vanguard of public life and to uphold medical education for women and all the various forms of larger duties and citizenship for women. But it should not be forgotten that this is possible owing to the bravery and patience of pioneers in all sorts of social reforms like Eliza Wigham.

In the small Friends' Meeting, as it was ten years ago, it is hardly necessary to say that Eliza Wigham was a pillar of the church. Indeed it is likely that the Edinburgh Meeting would have disappeared altogther if it had not been for the work and spirit of two women Friends, Eliza Wigham and Jane Miller.

One cannot think of this beautiful life without observing the contribution which the Society of Friends can make through isolated individuals to society at large. In centres where there is a considerable gathering of "influential Friends," a little unity and organized opinion will readily carry weight amongst Friends locally and in the great world outside. But in places where there is a small Meeting, and where Friends are not many or wealthy, how can they, in such a position, make the tenets of the Society of Friends an influence in the district? An answer is at hand—by following the example of Eliza Wigham, in whose life Edinburgh saw Quakerism, and tasted something of its fruit. Public spirit, personal energy, and the Quaker faith, though she was "isolated" and often alone, made her great influence what it became.

But it is none of these things which those who knew her will chiefly remember. It is the gentleness and graciousness, the singleness of purpose and purity of conduct, bred of holy communion and high fellowship, that must always be represented to us in the name of Eliza Wigham.—G. N., in (London) Friend.

Arithmetic, 1700 B. C.

Probably the oldest copy book for home lessons in arithmetic was recently unearthed in Egypt. The papyrus, which was found in excellent condition, dates from the period about 1700 B. C., that is, about one hundred years before the time of Moses, or almost 3600 years ago. It proves that the Egyptians had a thorough knowledge of elementary mathematics almost to the extent of our own. The papyrus has a long heading: "Direction how to attain the knowledge of all dark things," etc. Numerous examples show that their principal operations with entire units and fractions were made by means of addition and multiplication. Subtractions and divisions were not known in their present form, but correct results were obtained nevertheless.

Equations are also found in the papyrus. Among the examples given is this one: Ten measures of barley are to be divided among ten persons in such a manner that each subsequent person receives one eighth a measure less than the one before him. Another example given is: There are seven men, each one has seven cats, each cat has eaten seven mice, each mouse has eaten seven grains of barley. Each grain of barley would, if cultivated, have yielded seven measures of barley. How much barley has been lost in that way?" The papyrus also contains calculations of area, the calculation of the area of a circle, and its transformation into a square, and finally calculations of the cubic measurements of pyramids.—Episcopal Recorder.

WHY SHOULDN'T I?

My canary bird sings the whole day long,
Behind his gilded bars,
Shut in from all that birds enjoy,
Under the sun and stars;
The freedom, grace and action fine,
Of wild birds he foregoes,
But spite of that, with happiness,
His little heart o'erflows;
"The world is wide; and birds outside
In happy cheer abide,
Why shouldn't I?"

I, too, must dwell behind the bars
Of toil and sacrifice;
From weary heart and weary brain
My prayers or songs arise;
But all around sad hearts abound,
And troubles worse than mine,
If aught of comfort I can bring to them,
Shall I repine?
"God's world is wide; if I can hide
The crowding tears and sing beside,
Why shouldn't I?"

Sympathy Belated.

A Friend writes to us that a man from Philadelphia on leaving a barber's shop in a distant town which he was visiting this past summer, was presented by the proprietor with his printed business card, giving his name, employment and residence on one side, and on the other the following lines which he had printed with a hope that by distributing them among his patrons, a good influence might thereby be the result. They have been in print occasionally elsewhere, and, it may be, in our columns. They contain a lesson which bears repetition:

"Do not keep the alabaster boxes of your kindness and tenderness sealed up until your friends are dead. Fill their lives with sweetness, speak approving, cheering words while their ears can hear them, and while their hearts can be thrilled and made happy. The kind things you meant to say, when they are dead and gone say before they go. The flowers you meant to send for their coffins, send now to brighten and sweeten their homes before they leave them.

"If my friends have any alabaster boxes laid away full of fragrant perfumes of sympathy, good-will and affection, which they intend to break over my dead body, I would prefer they would bring them out in my weary and troubled hours, and open them that I may be refreshed, cheered and made better while I need them. I would rather have a plain coffin without a flower, a funeral without a eulogy, than a life without the sweetness of good-will and love.

"Let us learn to anoint all humanity beforehand for their burial. Post-mortem kindness does not cheer the hardened spirit—flowers on the coffin cast no fragrance backward over the weary way. Remember we travel the road of life but once; let us all try to make this world better by our having lived."

Superintendent John W. Carr, Anderson, Ind., says:—Common sense, knowledge, love—these are the three fixed points through which the circumference of a teacher's character must be struck. Omit any one and the symmetry is destroyed, and instead of a circle you have an eccentric. Omit common sense, and the teacher does those absurd and impracticable things that subject him to the sneers and ridicule of the world. Omit knowledge, and you have a case of the children asking for bread and receiving a stone. Omit love, and the souls of the litt one shrivel and die—or, perchance, are co gealed to ice in the frigid atmosphere of th school room.

Selections from the Letters and Memoranda Robert Milhous.

Fourth Month 15th, 1891.—I thought might be right for me this evening to leav on record for my remaining daughter Marth and my grandchildren, that this day I filled u my eightieth year and I may testify that I hav at different times, to all outward view, ver narrowly escaped with my life, by accidents various kinds. Indeed I may say I look upo myself as being a monument of Divine merc notwithstanding my great unworthiness, have been spared to old age, and at this da am still able to attend to moderate outdo labor. Be pleased, oh Heavenly Father, "n to leave me in my old age, nor forsake me wh my strength faileth."

Eleventh Month 25th.—A stormy mornin and on looking towards attending our Qua terly Meeting of Ministers and Elders whi was held at two o'clock this afternoon, I fe discouraged and tried to excuse myself fro attending, feeling feeble; but on trying t matter, to the best of my ability, I thoug best to make the attempt, and I was ma glad I was there, and the language of Pet when favored with James and John to witne the glory of our Holy Redeemer upon t mount, was much with me whilst sitting silence with my friends, when gathered on t occasion, which I expressed with some ad tions, in which I felt peace, and a renewed e dence that I am not forsaken.

Attended the Quarterly Meeting the ne day, which I believe was favored, and return home with feelings of thankfulness and pea Unworthy as I am, I think proper here record, with feelings of near unity and thar fulness, the visit, in gospel love of our de friend, Elizabeth Evans, with her brother W liam and Margaret Lightfoot as her compa ions, all of whom were very acceptably w us, and their social visit at our house was ve cordial to our feelings.

Eleventh Mo. 28th, seven o'clock P. M.—I lieve I have not been as watchful the past d as I ought to have been, and the language my heart is, "Oh, my Heavenly Father, pleased to forgive all my shortcomings."

Twelfth Month 6th.—At meeting to-day seemed led to speak of a neglect of manifest duty, as being a great means of the light bei withdrawn from us; which is attended w great danger to give way to, or to endeavor put away from us. Towards the conclusio was brought deeply to feel the awfulness presuming to approach the Divine Being prayer, which mortal man cannot acceptal do unless He opens the door and prepares t soul therefor.

First Month 18th.—At a meeting yesterd I was led to speak of the renewed desire I f that the seed of the kingdom, planted in t heart by the great Husbandman, might ta root downwards, and bear fruit upwards, s so to prevail that it might be not only to honor and glory but to our own everlasti peace and happiness; in which I felt peace.

Second Month 7th, 1892.—At our little me

; to-day, which was silent, the comforting l beautiful language seemed presented to mind, "He brought me into his banqueting use, and his banner over me was love;"
ich has left a precious impression on my nd, having a tendency to encourage the hope at I am still an object of my Heavenly ther's love and mercy.

Oh, my dear Saviour, be pleased to search and remove from my soul everything that offensive in thy sight, before I go hence to seen of men no more.

Third Month 13th, 1892.—For more than ree weeks I have been almost entirely con-ed within my house, and much of the time my bed with la grippe, and although my dily sufferings have not been very great, t it has been a season of much spiritual excise; but I have through Divine mercy for e most part been favored to feel a calm and peful mind, and enabled to trust in that Alghty power which has hitherto sustained through all my trials. Feeling some better
-day, I ventured out to our little meeting, ich I thought was a solemn and favored ason, in which I was engaged in public tesmony, to the relief of my own mind and rerned to my home in peace. May all praise ascribed unto Him to whom it is everlast gly due.

Ninth Month 4th.—At our little meeting
-day, soon after taking my seat, the prayer the psalmist arose freshly with me, "Set a tch over my heart, and keep the door of my s, to keep me from evil, and my lips from eaking guile," which I much desired to apply my own particular, but under an apprehenn that it might not be safe for me to let it st there in silence, I ventured upon my feet d endeavored, in a broken manner, to exess the desire which rested with me, that we might be thus engaged so as to be prerved from evil, and thus be made helpful to e another, in the way to the kingdom of aven, in which I believe I felt peace, although verty of feeling is much my clothing.

God's Help in Our Studies.—We count it isonable to look to the Lord for our daily ead; to apply to Him for aid and guidance the trials and emergencies of life; but how w are they who seek for the same aid from m and feel the same dependence upon Him matters of the intellect—in learning, in udy, in thought! It is very reasonable and coming. It is very necessary, that when we forth into the toil and business of the day, when our affairs present perplexing diffilties, we should cast ourselves upon the rd's protection and look to Him for counsel d guidance. But is it, can it be less needful at when we sit down to read, to write, to udy, to think, we should lift up our hearts stingly to Him and cry: "What in me is k illume, what is low raise and support?"
d can and will do this for us; and it would ase Him well to be asked to do it. Let us lieve that to pray earnestly is to study well;
l let us be sure that He will refuse nothing it we seek in singleness of heart only for service and his glory. How many difficuls that seem insuperable would be smoothed, w many blessed thoughts might be suggested,
w many forgotten things brought to mind, how many wearinesses refreshed, if we trusted more to God and less to ourselves, in the exercise of such gifts as He may have committed to us and in the supply of such as we want!—John Kitto.

For "The Friend."

Unity.

The Psalmist, a true philosopher, exclaims, "I am fearfully and wonderfully made, and that my soul knoweth right well." For whether we consider man as regards his body, mind, or soul, each, in itself, with its powers and functions, is marvellous. If then we come to dwell upon unity as applied to Christian fellowship, unity of the soul holds the chief place, that of the mind a secondary one; yet since the perfect man whilst on earth is in the flesh, that unity which comprises both is the most complete.

God creating man, breathed unto him a portion of his own spirit, of the breath of life, and man became a living soul; and had he not succumbed to temptation immortality was his. Through sin, death came, but through the grace and mercy of God, He opened up a door to life through his only begotten Son, the Word of God by whom God made man. Not only was this Word made flesh, dwelling amongst men, revealing the will of the Father, and accomplishing all things, according to the Divine counsel, but He is and ever has been "that quickening spirit" through whom men have been raised from their deadness of soul caused by sin, and made alive to God. In this life, of which He is the author, man has unity with God, for God is a spirit, and this unity is in the spirit of his Son, as Jesus said, "And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one. I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one" (John xvii: 22, 23).

Precious indeed then, as unity with the brethren in church fellowship is, yet his unity of the spirit with the Father of Spirits, through his Son, must ever be of primary importance to each Christian, and any unity amongst believers, which has not this as the chief foundation stone, is lacking in the great essential of unity. Unity with God, and unity with the brethren, his children, is one of God's choicest gifts to man. But peoples, however spiritual they at one time may be, are, like their component individuals, frail, and liable to decline into error. Happy was Joshua, foreseeing such a liability, in his determination, that though all Israel should forsake the Lord and serve other gods, "as for me and my house we will serve the Lord" (Jos. xxiv: 15). And the sequel proved how well grounded his misgivings were, for the next generation who had not seen the works of the Lord and knew Him not, went and served Baal (See Judges ii: 10, 11). And many like proofs have we of the inconstancy of man. Even the apostles one and all said, "Though all men forsake thee, yet will not I," and yet a few hours intervening, their ardor cooled, their faith vanished, and they all forsook Jesus in the hour of trial and fled." But Elijah, thinking himself alone amongst Israel, was faithful to his God. In view of these beacon lights, well may we rejoice with trembling. It is the Lord who is our Shepherd, else like poor wandering sheep, we might soon stray away. It is only as we daily and hourly walk with Him, as Adam did daily, as we walk in the spirit, that we can hold our fellowship with Him, and enjoy true unity with those who are also in the way. It is as the apostle declares "as we walk in the light, as God is in the light, that we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth from all sin. This light, life, grace, truth and spirit are all but different names for "God working in you to will and to do of his good pleasure." God gave of his spirit without measure to his Son, that He might give to every man, "according to the measure of the gift of Christ." We are "baptized by one spirit into one body," and each, partaking of the one Divine life, that of Christ, in Him we are one. This glory, God's Holy Spirit, God gave his Son, the Son gives it to those who believe and love Him. As grace, this spirit teaches; as truth, it throws a clear light, distinguishing truth from error; as glory, like the Shekinah above the mercy seat, it proves God's favor and presence; as light, it gives ability to do as the prophet said would be the case under Christ's dispensation, to discern between him that serveth God and him that serveth Him not," and this discernment is applied to thoughts within more than to men without.

They who are thus directed in their thoughts and ways, as God's promise is, "they shall all be taught of God;" who have also, the Holy Scriptures, God's will revealed to men, by this same spirit, which the prophets said should be ours; who have the same life, wherein they know and feel one another; one Holy Head, moulding the will and directing each member; they enjoy in all these a true substantial unity—unity in faith, spirit, doctrine and practice.

Without this unity, any other is poor indeed, and if God and truth be not the foundation it must needs be the wisdom and teaching of men, which after all is a sandy foundation whereon to base our hopes for eternity.

Shall we then make a creed the touchstone of unity? or the declaration of a synod or conference? or any conformity to certain rites or ceremonies? Not at all. Some of these may be advisory, but cannot be obligatory on the individual conscience. These may all err as the records of history prove they have done. If these had been obeyed the apostles and Luther, too, would have ceased to preach. George Fox did not hold these binding or he would not have withdrawn from the national religion. Paul exercised himself to hold a good conscience, void of offence before "God and man," and he who aims at this and has God's witness to that effect as the seal of his uprightness, possesses true religion. If God receives him, God's spirit in another will not condemn, and no man should judge another by his own spirit.

As the light of Christ makes manifest and reproves evil in the heart, so also does it enable those who walk in it to see evil, if there be any, in others; but reproving the evil, the spirit of Christ is still gentle and loving, and seeks to draw the sinner from the evil, and not harshly condemn him; for all must remember, that were it not for God's grace and mercy, ourselves would be no better, it might be much worse. This is the spirit of charity; which above all others with that humility which becomes poor, weak creatures of a day, leads into brotherly condescension, and a yearning care for each others' welfare and preservation from evil. These under God's blessing tend to preserve all in a blessed unity; but lacking these, there may be uniformity, where the strong minded rule the weaker ones, but that is not the true unity, which as far excels anything else the world may offer as gold does brass.

The church of Christ cannot then be too diligent and careful to weed out anything that would mar this blessed unity, the crowning beauty of Christ's garden, in whose walks He takes delight; for as the psalmist declares, this unity is as the anointing oil, qualifying for man's most sacred duty, that of the worship of his Lord. Our very thoughts towards others need to be watched in the light of Christ. "Let none of you imagine evil against his brother." And may we all ever bear in mind "That one is our Master even Christ and all we are brethren." No one but God has a right to dominion over the conscience, nor to lord it over God's heritage. As we draw nearer in spirit to Christ the Son of Righteousness, our difficulties, like stars before the morning sun, will grow less and less conspicuous, until bathed in his light and glory, He to us is our all in all. In heaven is perfect unity, and the saints on earth are permitted to "sit in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." W. W. B.

"WAITING FOR MY BOY."—A few years ago, in one of the growing cities of New York State, there was a home into which the great sorrow of a father's death had entered. The sons, of whom there were several, were of nervous temperament, full of animation and exposed to many temptations which endanger the youth in large cities.

The widowed mother realized the vast importance of her responsibility, and many a time did she look upward toward the heavenly Father for Divine aid in the guidance of her fatherless boys. She made it a rule never to retire for rest at night until all her sons were at home. But as the boys grew older this became a severe tax both on her time and health, often keeping the faithful mother watching until the midnight hour.

One of the boys displayed a talent for music and became a skillful violinist. He drifted among the wrong class of people, and was soon at balls and parties that seldom dispersed until the early hours of day.

Upon one occasion it was nearly seven o'clock in the morning before he went to his home. Entering the house and opening the door of the sitting-room, he saw a sight that never can be effaced from his memory.

In the old rocking-chair sat his aged mother fast asleep, but evidently she had been weeping. Her frilled cap, as white as snow, covered her gray hair; the knitting had fallen from her hands, while the tallow from the candle had run over the candlestick and down her dress.

Going up to her the young man exclaimed. "Why, mother! What are you doing here?"

His voice startled her, and, upon the question being repeated, she attempted to rise, and piteously, but, oh, so tenderly, looking up into his face, said.

"I am waiting for my boy."

The sad look and those words, so expressive of that long night's anxiety, quite overcame the lad, and throwing his arms around her, he said,

"Dear mother, you shall never wait again like this for me."

The resolution has never been broken.—Late Paper.

War and Peace Notes.

Examiner Preston, of the mint, calculated the number of gold dollars it required to support the army during the past fiscal year, and the size and weight of the sum moulded into a gold brick. The ninety-two million dollars that the army has cost would make a cubic block of solid gold eleven and one-half feet in each dimension, weighing about one hundred and sixty-nine tons.—Philadelphia Record.

Ellen Robinson expressed the hope that Friends would be faithful in their testimony against all war as contrary to the spirit of Christ. We are told that now all should keep silent. On the contrary, it is the time to make our voice heard, dwelling on the un-Christian nature of war. It is a duty to try to counteract the flood of misrepresentation overwhelming the judgment of the nation.—(In Meeting for Sufferings, London.)

The man who has sacrificed his own sincere convictions at the moment when it cost something to declare them, because he feared unpopularity, ridicule, or because he could not withstand the fierce rush of the popular current, has done to himself a more dreadful thing than he could possibly suffer from the unchained malice of his enemies. . . We, for one, reject the fallacy that because the government of the nation in which we have citizenship has committed itself to a given course of action therefore we should be silent as to the righteousness or unrighteousness of its policy. Once admit that proposition and the citizen becomes as much a conscienceless automaton as any military subject of the Russian czar. . . The true man knows that his party can never justly bid him serve it in disobedience to his duty to his country, and his country in turn can exact no allegiance which violates his duty to humanity. If the State says without cause, "Slay," God still declares, "Thou shalt do no murder." Disobedience to any such unjust command is the highest loyalty.—Herbert Welsh.

Christianity has nothing to gain in foreign lands if its presence is secured there by the policy of a Government whose methods are essentially imperialistic. The proof of this is furnished by the incontestable fact that the success of American missions in alien lands, without annexation or colonization, has been more remarkable among the natives than those that have been backed by the prestige of imperialism. . . Heretofore America has been regarded by the heathen as being free from the crimes committed against them by others, and hence the gospel from the lips of Christ's ambassadors has received respectful attention. But let her attitude change, let her become like all the rest, and let the enforcement of her sovereignty lead to outrages and executions, and her imperialism would be as pernicious to Christianity as was that of Rome.—Dr. Lorimer.

PILKINGTON OF UGANDA.—One remark we feel constrained to make, as we read the brief account of dear Pilkington's death. This invaluable missionary and translator, whatever may be the justification of it, joined the troops in quelling the second mutiny. He took up his position with Captain Harrison, who was leading the attack. Men were seen coming toward them, and were thought to be Waganda, but they opened fire, and proved themselves to be Nubians. One of them took deliberate aim at Pilkington several times, but each time missed him. Then Pilkington returned the fire, but the shots went equally wide of the mark. He fired again at Pilkington, and this time shot him right through the thigh, bursting the femoral artery. One of Harrison's Nubian officers then shot and killed the man who had inflicted on Pilkington his fatal wound. Shortly after, the beloved missionary fell asleep. He had gone out in the morning at seven; he was brought back before nine P. M. dead.

We have had more than once a doubt whether Christ's messengers of peace are to take up weapons of war; whether literally our weapons in the mission field, if they are to be mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds, are not to be spiritual in character. Had Pilkington kept himself to his work of translation and evangelization, he would have been so far as man can see, alive to-day. One can but notice how, until he returned the fire, he seemed to be Divinely sheltered from the deliberate aim of the foe; but after he fired his shots, the first return fire was fatal. What impression must be made on the heathen whom we seek to win to Christ, when they see a missionary taking up a rifle and marching against them! "The Son of Man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them." And what was the act by which the life of the man who had shot down Pilkington was taken, but an act of retaliation! We know of one missionary society, whose unswerving principle is not to attempt any act of violence, even in self-defence and they have never yet lost but one life by any act of violence on the part of the natives among whom they labor. With the utmost tenderness we feel constrained to ask whether our missionaries should not keep themselves to their work as God's heralds and witnesses, and whether an entirely pacific mission on their part would not seem in the eyes of pagan more consistent with their profession and the spirit of their Master. For ourselves we have long felt that war is not the occupation of the missionary, and every new instance, such as the beloved Pilkington furnishes, seems to erect a new warning for God's servants.—The Missionary Review of the World.

SUPPAWN, SAMP, SUCCOTASH.—The colonists ckly learned from the Indians to harvest, nd and cook this corn in many palatable ways, l the foods made from maize have retained to s day the names given by the aborigines, such hominy, pone, suppawn, samp, succotash. np and samp porridge were soon favorite hes. Samp is Indian corn pounded into a rsely ground powder in a mortar.

The laborious Indian method of preparing ize for consumption was to steep it in hot wa- for twelve hours, then pound the grain in mortar till it was a coarse meal. It was then ed in a small basket, and the large grains ich did not pass through the primitive sieve re again pounded and sifted.

Samp was often pounded in a primitive and turesque Indian mortar made of a hollowed ck of wood or stump of a tree. The pestle s a heavy block of wood shaped like the in- ior of the mortar and fitted with a handle ached to one side. The block was fastened the top of a growing sapling, which was bent r, and thus acquired the required spring back er the block, or pestle, was pounded down on corn. Pounding samp was slow work, often ie in later years by unskilled negroes, and ce disparagingly termed "niggering" corn. Chautauquan.

A FIRM, assured patience grows upon the ristian, enabling him to hold upon his way, leterred, unchilled by whatever he may meet n it; enabling him also, I know not to what er music, to build up his spirit to a strength alm, reliant conviction, even with the stones finds there, as a brook lifts up a more clear rapid voice for flowing over pebbles. The in upon the inner life has passed over from to Christ. The heart has grown wise, in- ucted, tolerant, tender with weakness, pa- t of imperfection.—Patience of Hope.

WORK AND WORRY.—"Studying too hard," "overworked," are charged with many deaths, but, in the majority of cases, most unjustly. Trouble kills, but it is a rare thing for a man to think himself to death, unless his thoughts are intimately connected with something painful and distressing. Study is a boon to the student. He would rather study than eat. The greatest students have lived long and happily to four-score and beyond.

Thought is to the brain what exercise is to the physical constitution; it keeps the channels of life clear, the blood-vessels unobstructed, and the vital fluid courses along them, distributing newness of life and vigor of action to the latest hours of existence; while the want of thought brings starvation to the circulation, and causes man to drivel and sleep in old age—dead as to everything except eating and cowering over the fire.

Men may study hard, and after fifty may study with comfort and advantage for five, ten, or fifteen hours day after day; and if the studies are pleasureable, they promote the general well-being of the system, both physical and mental, if only abundant sleep is had, with a regular supply of simple and nourishing food, sitting down to meals in pleasant moods and allowing a good half-hour before study is resumed.

Many of our literary men die prematurely, not from overstudy, but from depressing mental states and irregular or excessive eating and drinking. It is high pressure and constant tension, rather than steady, continuous labor of body or mind, which hurries multitudes to their graves years before their time. With all haste there is impatience, solicitude, worry, in the present age, we fear that everything is sacrificed to "hurry."—Public Health Journal.

"LEST ANY MAN SHOULD BOAST."—The Scriptures describe that joy in the Lord which accompanies the witness of his Spirit, as an humble joy, a joy that abases to the dust; that makes a pardoned sinner cry out, "I am vile! What am I or my father's house? Now mine eye seeth thee. I abhor myself in dust and ashes!"

Items Concerning the Society.

Wm. D. Harvey arrived in Philadelphia on the 5th instant, leaving J. S. Elkinton at Ottawa. The latter will visit Friends and Government officials in Canada for a few days, expecting to be at home about the 14th. He was in good health.

The subject of the freedom of the ministry, both from the point of view of avoiding a professional or stated ministry, and of maintaining the liberty of the membership to preach, claimed a large part of one of the sessions of the Yearly Meeting. The discussion was entered into by a number of our members from different parts of the Yearly Meeting with great earnestness. Their expression was unanimous that Friends have a position to maintain on this point, and that it needs to be maintained in life and power, and not merely in name. Our children should be taught the meaning and scope of it. The self-sacrifice needed and the weight of personal responsibility involved should not be shunned, but welcomed, as one of the great means of developing a strong Christian character. We need to emphasize the prophetic gift, as well as the teaching gift. We need to have all gifts freely exercised, without looking to any one man for the sermon. To preserve this freedom we must be in loving submission to the Lord and also to one another.—(Baltimore) Interchange.

We here continue quotations that have been met with from John Fiske's "Dutch and Quaker Colonies in America." "Quakerism," he says, "was the most extreme form which Protestantism had assumed. In so far as Protestantism claimed to be working a reformation in Christianity by retaining the spiritual core and dropping off the non-essential integuments, the Quakers carried this process about as far as it could go."

"The basis of George Fox's teaching was the belief that each soul is in religious matters answerable not to its fellows but to God alone, without priestly mediation, because the Holy Spirit is immediately present in every soul, and is thus a direct source of illumination."

"The Quakers were inspired by an aggressive missionary zeal which was apt to lead them where their company was not wanted."

"It was a renewal of Christ's teaching that religion is an affair of the inner soul, and not of externals" [except external obedience, we would add.]

Notes from Others.

"Religions are many: reason is one. We are all brothers." This phrase is on the lips of every Chinese, and the Chinese bandy it from one to the other with the most exquisite urbanity.— Huc's "Journey Through the Chinese Empire."

It is said that a "Bible trust" is one of the probabilities of the immediate future. The competition in selling Bibles has been so keen that a combination appears necessary, so that prices will not be cut down beyond the point of a reasonable profit. Such lively sale of Bibles as this shows is not a discouraging sign.

The Chicago Tribune says: "It is one of the requirements of valid confession and absolution that there should be 'a moral presence of the penitent with the confessor.' A written confession sent to an absent priest is not valid, but Father Devine, a recognized authority on Catholic theology, says that a priest might give absolution by telephone, under condition, to a person taken suddenly ill, so as to be in imminent danger of death, and when he cannot possibly reach the place where the person is, in which case 'the penitent and confessor may be truly said to be conversing together and consequently to be morally present to each other.'"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The opening of Congress Twelfth Mo. 4th, was witnessed by a larger throng of people than usual. In the Senate appropriate tribute was paid to the late Vice-President. The credentials of M. S. Quay as Senator from Pennsylvania by appointment of the Governor were presented by Senator Penrose, and on motion of Senator Cockrell, of Missouri, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Protests against the seating of Quay were presented by Senators Burrows and Jones, of Arkansas.

In the House, General David B. Henderson was elected Speaker. When the members were sworn in, Roberts the polygamist of Utah, approached the Bar. Objection to the administration of the oath was made by Taylor, of Ohio, which was joined in by McRae, Democrat, of Arkansas. The Speaker thereupon requested Roberts to step aside, which he did, on the understanding that such action did not prejudice his rights. Action of the case was postponed. Representative Taylor presented protest from over 7,000,000 American men and women against seating Roberts.

The Secretary of the Treasury transmitted the estimate of appropriations required for the next fiscal year. The grand total is $631,081,994, an increase over the estimates of the present fiscal year of $38,033,616.

The President has designated Adelbert F. Hay, a son of the Secretary of State, to take the place of Charles Macrum, Consul at Pretoria, who has been granted permission to leave his post at once.

The treaty for the partition of the Samoan Islands was signed at the State Department in Washington on the 2nd instant.

A Duluth despatch says that the demand for iron ore is so great that the Minnesota Iron Company will try the experiment of extending the navigation season one or two months, running its steamers without insurance. The open lakes do not as a rule freeze till Second Month, and the narrow channels will be kept open.

The total amount of bonds purchased under the recent offer of the Secretary of the Treasury, to Eleventh Month 28th, was $13,468,850.

A new cattle food is made by grinding the dry corn-stalks, leaves and tops to a powder, and mixing it with blood or molasses, or both. This is pressed into cakes under a hydraulic press, and can be shipped as easily as bricks or cord wood. For feeding it is broken up and mixed with water. Actual tests have been made at experiment stations and samples have been sent to agricultural stations in Europe. The reports from all sources are very encouraging. It is said at the Department that this food will be particularly valuable for our cavalry in the tropics, and that the food cakes can be made at a minimum cost in Cuba and the Southern States, where thousands of tons of low grade molasses go to waste annually, and where the cane refuse, ground fine, forms almost as satisfactory an absorbent base as corn-stalks. The cost of making the food cakes under fairly favorable conditions would be from $10 to $12 per ton, and their value on a nutritive basis would be from $22 to $25.

The Financial bill prepared by the Republican Caucus Committee which met at Atlantic City last spring, has been made public in Washington. It defines the standard unit of value to be the dollar of 25.8 grains of gold .9 fine or 23.02 grains of pure gold; establishes a separate division of issue and redemption; provides for the coinage of the silver bullion now in the Treasury into subsidiary coin, and for the recoinage of worn and uncurrent subsidiary silver coin, makes provision for the issue of notes of small denomination; permits the issue of bank circulation to the par value of bonds deposited, and substitutes a franchise tax for the tax on bank circulation, and provides for the organization of banks of $25,000 capital in communities of $2,000 inhabitants.

The culture of the pistache nut is likely to prove of very considerable value in California, Arizona and New Mexico. Along the Mediterranean, where the choicest walnuts and almonds are raised, the pistache is considered the very best of all nuts for table use.

The addition of magnesium in quantity not exceeding 30, and not less than 10, parts by weight to 100 parts by weight of aluminum imparts to the latter metal properties which in the pure state it does not possess, without raising its specific gravity, but, on the contrary, lowering it, as magnesium is even lighter than aluminum. The addition of magnesium produces an alloy which is harder and easier and cleaner to work than aluminum. Turning produces a surface as bright as a mirror, the metal coming off in long spiral turnings. The alloy files regular and clean, without tearing or choking the file, as aluminum does. Deep and sharp screw threads can be cut and clean holes bored. The color of the metal resembles silver more than aluminum, and it takes a high polish. The hardness and strength are considerable, and can be varied by varying the proportions.—Mining and Scientific Press.

FOREIGN—President McKinley has designated the son of Secretary Hay to succeed C. Macrum, Consul, in Pretoria. The Daily Telegraph says: "This appointment is a graceful concession on the part of the United States Government to British feeling. Our countrymen's interests will be safe in the hands of the new Consul."

In a speech at Leicester, on Eleventh Month 30th, referring to the position of England during the Spanish-American war, Secretary Chamberlain said:

"Our action proved to the Americans that we were indeed one people, of the same thoughts and guided by the same principles. The assurance that was given them in the course of the Spanish war will, I believe, never be forgotten, and has placed our relations in an admirable position. The union, the alliance, if you please, the understanding between these two great nations is indeed a guarantee of the peace of the world. But there is something more which I think any farseeing English statesman must have long desired—that we should not remain permanently isolated from the continent of Europe, and I think it must have appeared evident to everybody that the natural alliance is between ourselves and the German Empire."

Secretary Chamberlain's speech on the proposed new Tripple Alliance has aroused extraordinary interest in France and other continental nations, as well as in Great Britain.

Owing to the phenomenal sale of the newspapers consequent upon the African war, a paper famine is threatened in London. It is reported that the American supply has failed temporarily, and the advance in the price of wood and coal in England and France is proving an important factor in the increased cost of paper in those countries.

On Eleventh Month 28th, a terrific engagement took place between General Methuen's army and the Boers entrenched on Modder River. For fourteen hours the battle raged, and at night the Boers retired across the river, the British subsequently getting their forces over the stream, when hostilities ceased. Charges of British infantry were made in the face of a terrible hail of bullets. Lord Methuen's forces lost heavily, and there was great havoc among the Boers, who are said to have numbered 11,000.

f half the peace and harmony of human ercourse depends on how things are said, the er half depends on how they are received.

f the removal of the hat be a requisite for ine worship, how devoid of worship men and nen must be on the street and in much of ir daily work. To our mind the nature of ch of the popular worship is exhibited less what is on the head than by what is on the . "That which hath wings shall tell the tter" (Eccl. x: 20).

The seat of war is not in the Philippines, or outh Africa, but in the human heart. There where "nations shall learn war no more." ere is where peace must begin and war end, ether it crops out in families, in neighbor-ods, or in nations. There is where the Son of n came and comes "to destroy the works of devil," "to put away sin by the sacrifice of nself," to reconcile us "by his death and ch more save us by his life," from sin in its usand forms. After peace on the surface is lared by the governments, war, we fear, will less be going on as strongly though less bly, or visible in more petty ways, in hearts rywhere that are apart from Christ. And same unremitting labor will be called for at hands to "follow the things which make peace and whereby one may edify another.

Risking Life for Personal Triumph.

f the public assemblies of the "Salvation ny" should within a three months period duce here and there throughout the country death of nine young men and should maim ty-five others, and this be regularly expected a fruit of the system, what a volume of public dignation would arise, and how promptly would s be enacted to suppress the operations of h a religious movement, however virtue-pro-ting or soul-saving its object, or, we might l, its spiritual success. If similar results in leges were the average expectation of the study of Greek or of moral philosophy, how utterly would it be abolished by law.

But when the same results in lives and limbs regularly occur in foot-ball contests, another product of them may be the brutality lately quoted from the lips of some professor,—unknown to us and probably never having lost a son of his own,—who said, "what signify a few lives or limbs lost each year, in view of the patience and self-control and temperance to which the combatants are trained?" This argument, as has been observed, would justify the highway man's or the prize-fighter's mode of life, and is used for carnal warfare between nations. And the argument might have a show of excuse, if Christianity had not provided its more excellent way than risking the lives of our fellows in order to obtain the gift of self-control, of martyr-like courage, of patience, of every fruit of the Spirit. But those virtues are not really the object of playing foot-ball. "They do it to obtain a corruptible crown." There is enough in Christ's death, without pooling the lives of our fellows, to inspire the quest of virtues.

We are disposed to grant all the advantages that we have heard claimed for foot-ball contests. But we cannot see how all of them together can, though they gain the whole world, equal the value of a single life or soul, or excuse the immorality of deliberately risking a life for the exultation or the championship or victory gained. One has no moral right to engage to surrender his life to any one but its Giver, and still less for an object cheaper than his life, to say nothing of others' lives. "The Son of Man came not to destroy men's lives," and foot-ball, to be Christian, must leave killing out of its prospects.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

Referring to the interesting and grateful testimony of the Doukhobor patriarch, Ivan Machortoff, concerning the visit of Stephen Grellet and William Allen to his people, in 1818, as mentioned in THE FRIEND of 2nd instant, the writer recalls that upon his reading for the first time the account of S. Grellet's Life, perhaps thirty years ago, he was particularly impressed by the relation of the aforesaid visit to the various non-conformist communities in South Russia, being persuaded that such labors, so bearing the marks of Divine direction, would manifest their need of right value in due season.

It is gratifying, in connection with the service of welcoming these deserving exiles to our shores, and in settling them in humble homes and upon farm lands beyond the fiftieth parallel, that the engagement which has fallen so largely upon our religious Society, has been carried out conformably with Paul's recommendation in writing to the Romans, where he advises "he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity." The Truth enjoins this manner of doing upon us, so that its upholding may have its value for ourselves and for some of those around us to whom may be presented certain popular methods for raising money (as by balls, suppers, bazars, lottery devices, etc.), which are not to be commended. Related to this subject is the following expression adopted by the recent national convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, at Seattle:

"We believe there should be no compromise at any time with evil; therefore, we urge boards of education, regents of colleges, trustees of churches and directors of all religious institutions never to accept donations from breweries, distilleries and kindred corporations whose capital is obtained at the expense of human life, happiness and character."

Savings Banks of Roman Children.

The children of the Romans used to put their pennies into savings banks just as the children of the Yankees do to-day, says a correspondent of the Chicago Record. In 1866, when Prof. Thomas Wilson, of the Smithsonian Institution, was wandering about Ostia, the seaport of ancient Rome, he found a group of peasants excavating. They had dug out of the sand a number of pots and jars that had been buried for ages, and one of them had found a child's savings bank which contained 145 silver coins issued by the emperors of Rome between the years 200 and 19 B. C. As none of the later date were found, it is to be assumed some child lost this bank shortly before the Christian era, and it was covered for nineteen centuries by the encroaching sand.

Ostia is sixteen miles from Rome, at the mouth of the Tiber, and dates back to the time of the Emperor Ancus Marcius, who established salt works there. It grew with the growth of Rome, and in the days of Cæsar was a seaport of importance, with 80,000 inhabitants or more; but the debris brought down by the Tiber filled up the harbor and drove away the shipping, and subsequent centuries have transformed a busy commercial centre into a little fishing village of between two hundred and three hundred inhabitants. Tourists go there out of curiosity, and antiquarians are almost always digging in the sand that has filled the ruins.

The little savings bank was almost perfect when it was uncovered, but the peasant who found it broke it open to get the coins within. Professor Wilson found most of the pieces, however, and has been able to put it together. It consisted of a single piece of pottery about three inches wide, with a slit in the top through which the money was dropped.

Among the coins was a "denarius," or tribute money, which the Jews had to pay to the Romans. This coin was valued at about sixteen cents, and was shown to Christ with the question, "Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar or not?"

In the bank was a sample of the "widow's mite," referred to in Mark xii: 42, and Luke xii: 6. It was a Jewish coin, valued at two and a half mills.

Friends and the Indians of Pennsylvania.

In the latter part of the year 1763, the Western Indians, in the region of the Great Lakes and along the Ohio, were engaged in war with the whites, and murdered several hundred people. Incursions were made by some of these Indians into the Wyoming valley, who pressed Papoonung and his followers to join them in their attacks upon the inhabitants of Pennsylvania. This they refused to do, and as a measure of safety set out for Philadelphia. Here they were assigned to quarters in which other peaceable Indians from Bethlehem had already been collected. The popular feeling against all Indians at this time was very great, and attempts were made by the mob to destroy them, especially by a company from near Lancaster called the Paxton boys, who had previously murdered some twenty peaceable Indians residing near Conestoga. They remained in Philadelphia under the protection of the authorities until 1765, when Papoonung and his followers returned to their homes. While in the city, Friends frequently visited them, and rendered them valuable help. Heckewelder says that often "these Indians had been heard to say that during their troubles, which lasted one or two years, even the sight of a Quaker made them feel happy."

An interesting account of John Papoonung and of these events has been published in THE FRIEND, Vol. XVIII, page 29, and a tract entitled "John Papoonung, the Converted Indian, from an Account by Anthony Benezet," is one of the series of the Tract Association of Friends.

The settlements of the whites continued to encroach upon the Indians' lands and in 1768 in a treaty at Fort Stanwix, the Five Nations sold to the English all the land east of the Ohio. From this time on the emigration of the Indians of Pennsylvania to the westward continued.

The Five Nations laid claim by right of conquest, as they declared, to much of the land occupied by the Delawares; William Penn had satisfied both, purchasing the right of possession from the Delawares and that of sovereignty from the Five Nations. One writer says: "Peace and the utmost harmony prevailed for more than sixty years between the whites and the Indians; for these were for the first time treated, not only justly, but kindly, by the colonists. But, however gradually and peaceably their lands might have been purchased, the Delawares found themselves at last in the same situation as all other Indians, without lands of their own and therefore without means of subsistence. They were compelled to seek refuge on the waters of the Susquehanna, as tenants at will, on lands belonging to their hated conquerors, the Five Nations. Even there and on the Juniata they were encroached upon. . . Under these circumstances, many of the Delawares determined to move west of the Alleghany mountains and, about the year 1740-50, obtained from their ancient allies and uncles, the Wyandots, the grant of a derelict tract of land lying principally on the Muskingum. The great body of the nation was still attached to Pennsylvania."

The submission which the Delawares showed to the Five Nations has been spoken of as showing that they were not a warlike and fierce people, and that to this, therefore, rather than to the justice and kindness which marked William Penn's treatment of them is due their contented and peaceful disposition. But it is to be observed that as soon as they became the enemies of the Province all the ferocity and barbarous courage characteristic of Indian warfare was shown by them, and subsequent history has shown the Delawares as among the most cruel, aggressive and relentless of the Indian nations.

The testimony of William Penn as to their warlike character in his day is of value. In a letter written in 1701, he says, "I have had divers meetings with the several nations of Indians of these parts, as the Shawnee, Susquehanna, Schuylkill and Delaware Indians, by arguments and many presents, to persuade their submission to the Government and not to war with one another and other Indians under Governments that are under the Crown of England, but rather that they would refer their differences to the respective Governments they live under. At last they have agreed to war no more upon Indians in the neighboring Governments, nor anywhere else under the Crown of England, but to refer to me and the Governments of those Indians with whom they may have differences, the decision and issue of any such differences."

Had such a wise course been pursued by the different Provinces how many valuable lives both of Indians and whites might have been saved and the colonies trained in a method of settling differences which might have given a different and far more happy experience in dealing with the demands of Great Britain in subsequent years. It is probable William Penn's return to England soon after this was written may have in considerable degree prevented the execution of his plans as thus outlined.

William Penn in speaking of the number of the Indians at this period, says, "I am told [they] make at least one thousand fighting men." This would imply an Indian population of about five thousand, probably consisting chiefly of the tribes above referred to, and living in the southeastern part of what is now the State of Pennsylvania.

In considering the causes which have led to the disappearance of the Indians from Pennsylvania, the effects of diseases introduced among them by the white settlers must not be overlooked.

One of the early settlers in west New Jersey, Mary Smith, relates that "after the English did come more and more, there came a sore distemper among the Indians, that they died so fast that in some places their bodies wasted above ground, they could not bury all the dead."

She also says, "The Indians being very numerous, and of a strange language, yet by God's providence they were made helpful at the first settling, for they brought venison and wild fowls; also corn, to sell to the English. They were also a defence from the ravenous beasts by hunting and killing them."

"Without any carnal weapons we entered the land, and inhabited therein, as safe as if there had been thousands of garrisons, for the Most High preserved us, both from harm of man and beast. This may be of some service to the future generations to look on, and consider the steps of their fore-elders, which well considered may be to their edification and satisfaction."

The care of Friends to do justice to the Indians led to the preparation in 1763 of the following minute by the Yearly Meeting in pursuance of a request for advice upon the subject from the Western Quarterly Meeting, who had felt straitened in regard to issuing certificates to Friends "who remove to North Carolina or elsewhere and settle on lands which have not been purchased from the Indians and are yet claimed by them."

"On consideration of the request from the Western Quarter: it is the solid sense and judgment of this meeting that Friends should not purchase nor remove to settle such lands as have not been fairly and openly first purchased from the Indians, by those persons who are or may be fully authorized by the Government to make such purchases, and that Monthly Meetings should be careful to excite their members to the strict observance of this advice and where any remove so contrary to the advice of their brethren, that they should not give certificates to such persons, but use their endeavors to persuade them to avoid the danger to which they expose themselves, and to convince them of the inconsistency of their conduct with our Christian profession."

After the removal of a large number of the Indians to the Muskingum, but few Indians probably remained in Pennsylvania, east of the Alleghany Mountains. In 1773 the Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia mentioned in letter to the Meeting for Sufferings in London "Most of the Indians are now removed farther westward; they have for some years past repeatedly solicited Friends here, to send some well qualified persons to settle among them for the religious instruction of them and their children, which they have also warmly urged to the consideration of the Governor of Pennsylvania, in their messages from their council but as no Friend hath yet offered under a proper engagement of mind and call for this service, we have not yet been able to satisfy them in the manner we desire."

A SLOW CITY.—Philadelphia has the name of being slow and sleepy; but yet, as the largest manufacturing city on the continent, it is not so far behind as some suppose. The Saturday Evening Post says:

"Philadelphians laid the first railroad; a John Fitch navigated the first steam vessel on the Delaware River, in July, 1786—many years before Robert Fulton's earliest steamboat plowed the waters of the Hudson. The first steamboat service in the world for carrying passengers and freight was established on the Delaware in 1790, between Philadelphia and Wilmington, covering 3,000 miles in about four months.

"The first medical school in the United States as opened in Philadelphia in 1752, and the st law school was started in the Quaker City 1790. Philadelphia established the first spital in this country connected with a uni-rsity. The first school of anatomy in North nerica was opened by Dr. Wm. Shippen in ovember, 1762. The first pleasure grounds this continent for the use of the people were d out in Philadelphia in 1681, and the first nerican volunteer fire company was organized re in 1736.

"The first fire insurance company in the olonies was a Philadelphia concern, incorpored in 1751, and the first corporate banking stitution was established here by resolution Congress in 1781—the Bank of North nerica. The first establishment ever devoted the relief of the sick—the Pennsylvania ospital—was in Philadelphia."

erited mercy, that I am what I am.

"I was born at Sandy Spring, Maryland, the th day of the Second Month, 1806. My eat-grandfather, Joseph Hampton, came from gland, and settled in Bucks Co., Penna. My andfather being John Hampton, and my ther also, I am the third one of that name.
y mother's name was Mary, she being the ughter of Zachariah and Bethuela Betts, of cks Co., Penna.

"My parents raised eleven children, and all t two retained their right in the Society as ng as they lived. I attribute much to my ar parents for my getting along as I have, eir example and precept having never lost eir influence on my mind.

"They were not as narrow in their views, r as strict in some respects as some, and ay have been censured therefor; but they ought a little liberty, with suitable caution d advice, was the proper way for them to ing up their children.

"In looking back at the exemplary conduct my dear parents, and their many lively expressions near the final close of their lives, I feel a comfort and assurance that their end was peace. Oh, that I may follow them, as I believe they followed Christ!

"My parents, not liking to live amongst slaves, or in a slave-holding State, thought it best to move. So in the spring of 1825, they, with their children then living, moved to Ohio, and were both buried at Pennsville, Ohio.

"I was in very early life visited with something I then knew not what it was, but it many times so affected me that tears flowed plentifully from my eyes, and a sweet feeling that tongue cannot express was the covering of my mind.

"I think it was in the ninth year of my age. I was very much concerned, and very often breathed this prayer: 'Oh, that I may die the death of the righteous, and that my last end may be like his!' And often, very often, for some years, did I walk alone in quiet places with the testament, or some other good book in my hand, and on some stump, log, or fence, I would sit and read or meditate. Oh, how plainly are depicted in my mind the places I used to resort to, as well as the feelings that attended me on these solemn occasions! I had no need of going to Sabbath-schools, (as they are called), to have the Scriptures expounded, for they were opened to me in the light of truth greatly to my comfort.

"I was exceedingly fond of hearing preaching, and thought that preachers were very good people; and I felt very desirous that I might be a preacher when I should become a man. How little I knew what I would afterward have to go through in regard to this!

"One experience that affected me very much came from reading these lines of the poet, viz:

'All our gayety is vain,
All our laughter is but pain.'

For weeks I dared not laugh on any occasion; and it was cause of trouble to me to see any of the family laugh, particularly my mother. I wondered how she dared to laugh! It was some time before I got over this conviction. But as time passed on I again partook of the sports of youth until I was about fourteen years of age, when another great concern came upon me. I feared that I was not as good as I should be. I seemed destitute of any good thing, though I often craved to do right and be what I should, and for weeks went mourning on my way. Being at meeting one day, a travelling friend was there, whom I had never seen, who pretty soon stood up and began to preach, but I could feel nothing good for some time. After awhile, however, he spoke of someone who was very much tried, and, making a little pause, said, 'Fear not, little one, thou art much nearer the kingdom than thou has any idea of.' Oh, it seemed as if he said it right to me! And joy and peace flowed into my heart that pen and language fail to portray. Tears of contrition rolled down my cheeks, and I went home rejoicing.

"It was five miles to our meeting, and I often walked alone, though I might have ridden; but poverty or leanness of mind was so often my condition that I thought it was not right for me to ride a horse that worked, and then not be benefited by going; and if I walked I would not be accountable for using the poor, dumb brute. Not only so, but by walking I could go alone and spend the time in meditation; and often these walks were seasons of comfort to me."

It may be said of my grandfather that this carefulness of dumb animals was a characteristic of his life. He was always thoughtful, not only of his horses, but of all the domestic animals under his care; feeding, watering and bedding them well, and driving at a moderate pace, etc. "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast," said the wise King Solomon.

"I may not pass by in silence, a deep exercise I passed through in, I think, my sixteenth year. I had my schooling at a Methodist meeting-house, and I sometimes went to their meetings. I felt that there was a goodly feeling amongst them; for on some occasions, and at some of their performances, I could see tears rolling down their cheeks, and I began to think about joining them. I closely examined their ways, and noticed that when in their most solemn devotions, and when there seemed to be the most feeling, they would strike up and sing. Now, although I was very fond of singing, it opened to me in the light that tuning and following tunes was stopping short of true feeling, making a form and losing the substance. I do not write this wishing to hurt them, for I believe there is good amongst them, but I found it would not do for me. I saw plainly that if I would be a Christian, I must be one in spirit and in truth. That it must be in the heart, in silent prostration before the Lord; a union and communion with the Holy Spirit, wherein the 'spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered.' That singing is solemn and somewhat devotional I do not deny, but true feeling goes farther than vocal sound.

"Coming now to man's estate, young company took up much of my attention. Although I never ran to excess, nor committed anything that would be considered very bad, yet I went to such lengths that it often brought condemnation, so that I would make a stop, renew covenant and obtain some peace. But oh, these resolutions, how easy it was to break them! And years slid away in vanity. But I have cause to admire the mercy and forbearance of my dear Redeemer. He followed me with his reproofs and sometimes with the tendering incomes of his love; so that I have great cause to bless and praise his ever worthy name, and have this testimony to bear that to Him 'every knee shall bow and every tongue confess.' All good comes from Him, and to Him all praise belongs.

"About this time I was impressed with the belief that I must speak in meetings, but human nature shrank from such a work. I remembered that I had craved when young to become a preacher; but now the thing seemed different from what I had thought, and I put it from me; and instead of yielding to what I believed was required of me, ran into company and very much buried my talent in a round of what might be termed youthful enjoyments.

"About the twenty-first year of my age I became acquainted with a young woman, to whom I took a fancy, and we lived near together. We were often in each other's company, until I had strong desires to marry. But when I looked toward marrying, a secret uneasiness would arise. Thus a continual conflict was kept up for some months, so that I knew not what to do. I much desired that I might do right, but could not see why I should be so beset about it; and one day while alone and in much distress, a language as plain as if vocally spoken, ran through my mind, saying, 'If it is right, why thus trouble about it?' This language went to the heart, and I immediately gave it up, of which I informed her, and we parted in good feeling.

"This was another circumstance for which I had cause to bless and praise his ever worthy name, for I afterward saw that it would not have been a happy union. I mention this to show how I have been preserved, as also to show how careful young people ought to be to attend to the inward monitor, for when I came to get the one I did, I had none of those gloomy, unpleasant feelings, but a feeling of approbation, and our union has been a good one and cause for great thankfulness."

It is thought the account of his choice for a wife is of sufficient interest and wholesome instruction to warrant a break in the narrative of his life in order to give it. Although not found among his manuscripts, it was given verbally to a grandchild in the spring of 1892, and was shortly afterward written from memory as she understood his wish to be. He also gave the information that he had once committed it with much other matter to writing, but that in a season of great discouragement he had destroyed almost every piece of his earlier composition. The account is given in as nearly his own words as can be remembered, and is as follows: "When I was about twenty-three years of age I began to think seriously that the time had about come for me to take a wife. There were in the circle of my acquaintance two virtuous young women, both of whom I had for some time admired. They each lived at no great distance, but in opposite directions from the place I made my home, which made their homes some distance apart. As I had been pondering on the subject for some time, feeling that I could be satisfied with either one could I but know which one would be the right one for me, if either, I felt above all things to desire the guidance of my Heavenly Father, and put up my secret prayers many times for his pointing finger to guide in such a manner that I would not have a doubt as to his will concerning the important step."

A CALCULATING BOY.—A schoolboy sends us the following, which is a plain statement, from the standpoint of a lad of thirteen years, of the cost of raising a boy or girl:

"It does not take as much money to live in the country, or a small town, as it does to live in the city.

"I read the other day that it costs five thousand dollars to bring up a city boy and educate him and dress him well.

"I said to myself, 'That is because everything in the city has to be bought and living is high.'

"But I began to study the thing, and I found out that even a country boy costs his parents a good deal.

"When you count what a boy eats and what he wears, and the school-books he has to have, and the doctor bills that have to be paid when we get the measles or the scarlet fever, he will cost his folks at least one hundred dollars a year.

"I guess if a boy is pretty bad to smash things or to kick his shoes right out he costs more than that.

"So when I am twenty-one and old enough to do for myself I shall have cost father more than two thousand dollars.

"Mother cooked my victuals, made my clothes and patched them, washed and ironed for me, took care of me when I was a little fellow and whenever I was sick, and she never charged anything for that.

"If she were dead and father had to hire all that done it would cost him another hundred dollars a year more and that's two thousand dollars' worth of work mother will have done for me by the time I am a man.

"Four thousand dollars for a boy! What do you think of that? These are hard times.

"When parents put four thousand dollars on a boy, what have they a right to expect of him?

"Is it fair for a boy to play truant at school?

"Is it fair for him to play ball, go in swimming, or hang around town all the time, when maybe his father's potatoes are not dug nor the wood brought in for his mother?

"Is it fair for him to disappoint them by swearing and drinking?

"Some of our parents have put about all the property they have into us boys and girls.

"If we make spittoons and whiskey jugs of ourselves, they will be poor indeed.

"But if we make good citizens and substantial men they will feel as if they had good pay for bringing us up.

"Let's make up our minds now to pay the debt we owe to our parents and we shall be happy and make them happy also."—Exchange.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Genealogy.

In the early days of mankind genealogical records held an important place in the annals of the human race. Each patriarch formed a page in history, for all history was handed down to posterity by word of mouth. The Books of Moses are among the very earliest writings, wherein speech is portrayed by using literal signs, or letters, designating elementary sounds by means of which, with their various and endless combinations, human language among all nations is framed. The inspired historian rapidly reviews the most remarkable events in the antediluvian period, carrying down from Adam to Noah the genealogical record, doubtless having respect to the prophecy that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent, and looking forward to the restoration of man, in that second Adam, whose coming and birth in Bethlehem were heralded by angels signifying it to be an event of not less moment than the first creation of man; and indeed the whole history of mankind hangs on this memorable epoch.

No more fit setting could be given to the history of the world, than the genealogy of the various heads of families, which after the confusion of tongues at Babel, developed into nations, than that which Moses has given, noting the territories peopled by their descendants. Interesting as these have proved to be to the historian and the philologist, like land marks to their researches, yet the lapse of time, and the continual turnout among and mingling of nations, have much impaired the distinctness of view as regards the real founders of th nations. But amidst all the casualties of tim the lineage of Abraham and of his descendant by Sarah down to Jesus Christ remained i tact. Both Abraham and Isaac were father of other nations besides that to which God promise pertained, so Jacob, surnamed Israe is properly called the father of Israel, and th name belongs wholly to his descendants alon

Genealogy became a matter of greater in portance to the Israelites than to any othe people, either before or since, and principall for two reasons. First, from the hope tha the promised seed of Abraham, in whom a nations were to be blessed, might possibly t one of their descendants. Prophecy indee pointed first to Abraham, then to Isaac an Jacob; and Jacob speaking prophetically o his dying bed pointed to Judah; but prophec is rarely clearly comprehended until such tim as it is fulfilled.

This promise was not subsequently given t any particular family or individual, until suc time as David, chosen to be King over Israe sat upon the throne, after God had proved hi to be a worthy son of Abraham, in his faithfu ness under trial. The sacred historians remar the coincidence, that fourteen generations i tervene, three separate times between Abr ham, David and Jesus, but the exact record kept by the Jews enabled the apostles to trac scribe a direct and indisputable lineage fro Adam to Jesus, a space of probably 4000 yea or more. But from David both a royal and natural descent is given. The first throug King Solomon, the son of Bathsheba, fro whom Joseph the reputed father of Jesus wa descended as given by Matthew. Joseph a the husband of Mary, according to Jewis polity became possessed of all the possession and political claims of his wife. Mary, her self was of the direct descent from Davi through Nathan, (Luke iii, 31; 2 Sam. v., 14 and it is remarkable that the Jewish rabbi taught that the promised seed of David shoul spring from Nathan. Luke records this de scent, and it is worthy of note that in givin genealogies the Jews, owing as before said t the husband becoming possessed of all right and titles of his wife, a son-in-law by Jewis usage, is often recorded as a son without fur ther comment. Luke thus designates Joseph a son, though actually a son-in-law to Heli and in like manner Salathiel, son-in-law of Neri This same Joseph according to Matthew wa the son of Jacob; in like manner Salathiel, by Matthew, is recorded as the son of Jechonias The line of descent diverges from David, re unites in Zorobabel, again dividing betwee Abiud, his eldest son, and Rhesa the youngest Joseph's line being taken from the former, and that of Mary from the latter. Finally, both the royal and natural line of descent unite i Jesus, as the Son of David, and heir to David' throne. Well might Pontius Pilate, write i truth, "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews." Rejected as such by the Jew natural, accepte by the Jew spiritual, as the King of Israel, th King of Glory.

The second reason which conduced to th keeping of correct genealogical records, wa that the lands allotted to each separate trib and family of Israel were inalienable, nor coul they be permanently sequestrated, nor eve beyond the year of Jubilee, which came every fiieth year, when all lands reverted back to eir original owner or his direct heir. Nor, decided in the case of the daughters of lophedad, could daughters, who, having no others, were heiresses, marry any one of other tribe, without forfeiting their inherince. But houses in cities did not come unr this law.

The tribe of Levi, having no tribal inherince but only scattered cities and suburbs of ies, were in these possessions subject to the me laws as the other tribes, but a restricon in their sacerdotal rights, was placed on e priests, of the family of Aaron, who in der to continue eligible to serve as such in e temple, were obliged to establish their aim of descent from the records kept in the mple, and failing to do this were debarred om serving as priests. This was actually e case with the children of Habaiah, whose n Koz, married a daughter of Barzillai, the leadite; these, failing to establish their de-ent after the return of the Jews from Baby-n, "were put from the priesthood as pollut-," (Neh. vii : 63,) until such time as "there ood up a priest with Urim and Thummin."
nd such a High Priest undoubtedly Christ sus is, who makes those who in Truth serve im, "kings and priests unto God his father," he promised by his prophets, pouring out his Spirit upon them, anointing them thereith, as He did Aaron; which Spirit was rist's without measure, and these his priests fer unto God holy spiritual sacrifices, accept-le to God through that one offering which rist Jesus made once for all, when in accord ith the Divine will, He tasted death for every an, dying as the Lamb of God, slain from the undation of the world, and who taketh away e sin thereof.

And how came those priests who served unr the law, to cease from their sacrificial ser-ce? Because when, as Christ had foretold, e temple was destroyed by the soldiers of tus, all those genealogical records were burnt.
one were saved. To this day all are there-re necessarily put away from the priesthood, ntil such time as they turn to Him, who apinted of God even before Aaron was born, a priest after the order of Melchisedec was abide such for ever; hence we see how wrong is among Christians for any particular class men to usurp this title to themselves, to the xclusion of all other members of the church, rist's body. The same term "for ever" was ed by Nathan the prophet, when pronouncg God's blessing on David's seed, "Thine use and thy kingdom shalt be established for er before thee; thy throne shall be establish-for ever," (II Sam. vii : 16.) On hearing is, David went in and sat before the Lord, id prayed that God would make his mercy and omise sure to David and to Israel for ever.
these two characters as King and Priest of od's people, the prophet Zechariah thus de-neates Christ Jesus, "Even He shall build the mple of the Lord, and He shall bear the glory, id shall sit and rule upon his throne; and He all be a priest upon his throne; and the coun-l of peace shall be between them both" (Zech.
: 13). Signifying that they who in contin-ed obedience serve Him as their King and ord, to them He is a priest, making reconciltion by the efficacy of his one appointed crifice of himself for all sin and transgression, God freely forgiving them the same when truly repented of for his great name's sake.

Did the apostles attach any importance to genealogy? None whatever to their own, simply to that of Jesus, as an evidence of God's promise and prophecy fulfilled, and as a means of establishing us in and strengthening our faith. And since Christians are true children of Abraham and heirs to the promises through faith, and not through natural descent, consequently genealogy loses its importance to us and becomes a matter merely interesting. To be born again, born of the spirit, is of incomparably greater moment to each one of us than to be the heir of a king. And to be truly a child of God is a greater and more enduring honor than to be the son of any earthly potentate. And even in natural descent it is a happier lot to be the child of healthy, honest, god-fearing parents, than to be a scion of nobility, who, too often move in a circle contaminated by immorality and effeminacy and when children surrounded by profligate courtiers; debased by pride and where a truly humble Christian walk is unhappily so seldom found.

It is good to revere the memory of godly forefathers, to preserve the annals of their trials and conquests that we may emulate their virtues; but their virtue makes the child no better unless he is found walking in their footsteps. "Honor thy father and thy mother" is God's command, to keep which draws down a blessing from on high, and as we honor the earthly parent, we know better what it is and how to honor our Heavenly Father. To honor is to take pleasure in doing what we know to be their will, doing the things well pleasing to them. "Children obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right."

And lastly it is worthy of observation, how as exemplified in after years among the Israelites, bitter enmity, jealousies and deadly strife, arose between natural born children, but among those born of the peaceable, gentle, loving Spirit of Christ, no such things can possibly enter, for every one born of our Heavenly Father, loveth him that is born of Him. Christ Jesus the only Begotten Son of God said, "By this shall all men know that ye are my desciples, if ye have love one towards another." Friends of Jesus, of God and of one-another, and like Jesus even to Judas, "Friends" to all men, for his command to all is "Love ye your enemies."

THE WATER LILY.

O star on the breast of the river,
O marvel of bloom and grace,
Did you fall straight out of heaven,
Out of the sweetest place?
You are white as the thought of an angel,
Your heart is steeped in the sun;
Did you grow in the golden city,
My pure and radiant one?

Nay, Nay, I fell not out of heaven,
None gave me my saintly white;
It slowly grew from the blackness,
Down in the dreary night.
From the ooze of the silent river
I won my glory and grace—
White souls fall not, O my poet!
They rise to the sweetest place.

VOCAL WINDS.

BY JESSE EDGERTON.

As I sit within my room
In the twilight's deep'ning gloom,
While the autumn wind without Flings the fallen leaves about
At my doorway, shrieking, sighing,
With a sad and plaintive crying,
Do I hear it?
The wild spirit
Of the wind.

Oh, the voices of the wind!
Oh, the music that we find!
In its wild and reckless playing,
In the sobbing and the swaying,
In the treble and the drawing,
In the wierd and solemn moaning,
In the moaning
And the groaning
Of the wind.

Sweet the notes to him who listens,
As the dew of springtime glistens
On the earth grown warm and tender,
In the season's revival splendor,
With her balmy lips confessing
To the rythm and the blessing,
To the blessing
And caressing
Of the wind.

And the summer full of sweetness,
Full of Nature's own completeness
Smiles to catch the soft refrain
Of the wind among the grain,
Of the fragrance-laden breeze
And its music in the trees,
Trembling ever
To the quaver
Of the wind.

And the autumn growing old
In his robes of red and gold,
Hears the low and stilled moan
Of the wind's sad monotone,
And the brown leaves downward flying,
Hears them rustle to the sighing,
To the sighing
And the crying
Of the wind.

Like a monarch on his throne,
Winter, sad and hoary grown,
Joys to hear the north wind sweep,
Snow-clad hill and stormy deep,
Loving the melodies that find Voice in the howling of the wind,
In the howling
And the growling
Of the wind.

Thus the seasons tell the glory
And the winged winds the story,
How their notes of music fall
Earthward from the Lord of all
As he touches heaven's own keys,
Waking wondrous harmonies,
And rejoices
In the voices
Of the wind.

Like an echo from the past,
When through God's creation vast,
Burst the song through heaven that rang
Where the stars together sang;
And the echo seems to float
Like some stray aeolian note,
Still ringing
And singing
In the wind.

ONE KIND OF FICTITIOUS READING.—We may often think that we understand what is written when we only recognize therein modes of thought and of expression which are familiar to ourselves and current among our associates, but which we do not at all understand aright. Such reading must evidently be fictitious reading of the most deceptive kind, and, of course, must be left out of account in every just estimate and comparison of substantial literary values.—R. R.

Visit of J. S. Elkinton and William B. Harvey to the Exiles in Canada.

RASTHERN, Sask, Eleventh Month 27th, 1899.

WM. EVANS,

Dear Friend:—The last notes sent carried us as far as our return to Winnipeg from the Doukhobor settlements reached from Yorkton. There are but two trains per week to Prince Albert; this gave us nearly two days in Winnipeg, which seemed short enough to attend to matters connected with our business. Leaving the last named point on Fourth-day evening, the 22nd, at 16.30 o'clock (the twenty-four hour system being in vogue on the railroads in the Northwest), in company with our former interpreter, we sped along towards Regina, which point we reached about 6.30 o'clock morning; the weather was fine, and after a night spent in the sleeper we appreciated the bracing air, mercury 16°.

Regina is the capital of the Northwest Territory, an important place; the town is spread over considerable ground, though buildings are much scattered. The ride up the Prince Albert branch railroad is not particularly interesting; it traverses a vast expanse of prairie; not a tree the size of one's wrist being visible for hundreds of miles from the road. Some of the scheduled stations consist of sign-boards on the telegraph poles. At the lunch station we were informed that the nearest neighbor was forty miles distant. Antelopes are quite numerous, though we saw but one small herd, which of course took to their heels, though we had a good view of them.

We had expected to come to this point, but when we reached Saskatoon, we learned that the North branch of the Saskatchewan River was not passable, that much ice was "running," thus impeding our trip to the "Duck Lake" Doukhobor villages; leaving the train we spent the night.

Saskatoon is on the south branch of the above river, which is quite a large stream. A genial gov't land agent is stationed here, and a letter of introduction to him from the Commissioner at Winnipeg resulted in our being comfortably fitted out next morning, and we started for the farthest Doukhobor villages of the district, about thirty miles distant. We stopped for dinner at a mail station on the Battleford trail. The proprietor was formerly a wealthy Englishman, who invested largely in land about Winnipeg during a boom, and lost very heavily. He appeared to be a man of character, and was acquainted with some Irish Friends near Cork.

At this point we met a wagon train, hauling to Battleford from Saskatoon, ninety miles distant, this being the nearest railroad point. Swift Current, two hundred miles distant, was formerly the railroad station for Battleford, which, years ago, was the capital of the Northwest Territory. The hauling of supplies to such an important place we would think a great undertaking. The summer rates are fifty cents per hundred pounds, and in winter one cent per pound. We also met here a Presbyterian minister returning from a conference in Winnipeg to his home in Battleford. He seemed to be a man of deep religious experience.

The first Doukhobor village was reached about the middle of the afternoon. It was fairly well located and the inhabitants seemed cheerful. A woman had been suffering with erysipelas; to give an idea of the means of obtaining medical attendance, this case might be cited: word was sent to the commissioner in Winnipeg, who in turn informed authorities in Ottawa, who wired to Prince Albert for a doctor, and an interpreter at Duck Lake, and they got a team at Saskatoon, the trip occupying about two days. It was a satisfaction to find the patient better.

Last summer, a cloudburst in the Rocky Mountains, together with the melting snow, caused the river, not far distant, to rise very much, tearing away log booms above; great quantities of timber being stranded within reach of the settlers, of which they take advantage in building, though some sod houses were to be seen; the night was spent at one of the stations of the mounted police, where we were courteously treated. The senior officer, who was from Ireland, spoke kindly of Friends. He had known the Richardsons there.

Near by was a government telegraph station —Cowley. The line was built before the railroads penetrated this north country, and extends, for many hundreds of miles, as far west as Edmonton.

On Seventh-day, the 25th, the remaining two villages were visited. In all of these settlements, we found less real want than in the Yorkton colonies; these people being from the last ship-load, who did not suffer persecution to so great an extent as others. But wrong impressions are apt to be made when the situation is accepted from heresay evidence.

Some of the men were at work, though it seemed very doubtful whether all had sufficient food to keep them until able to grow some for themselves.

Rasthern was fifty-two miles distant from our lodging place, and it seemed particularly desirable to reach it that night, which meant a heavy day's work.

We followed near the course of the north branch of the Saskatchewan River for a good part of the day, and saw many old buffalo trails, made when they roamed over these prairies, and leading to the water. As in our own country, these animals have been killed for their skins, and their bones have been shipped from the railroad points in large quantities. At Saskatoon we were told that the bones of two hundred and fifty thousand buffaloes were lying there at one time. We reached a Mennonite settlement near six o'clock, stopped to feed the team, and partook of the hospitality offered us. Procuring a guide to pilot us over territory unfamiliar to our teamster, we pursued for a while a tortuous course, around quarter sections and over plowed ground, where the trail had been plowed up and no other established.

Rasthern was reached about 10.30 o'clock. A beautiful auroral display helped to cheer us as we rode along, over a very rough trail. The Mennonite settlement through which we passed is quite large.

PRINCE ALBERT, Saskatchewan, Eleventh Month 28th.

Rasthern is a place of near two hundred inhabitants, and enjoys a large and increasing trade with the many new settlers, Mennonites, Doukhobortsi, Galicians and others. The past season had been a particularly poor one for wheat, and the quality of that cereal being ground at the roller mill near by, was poor indeed; dark and much shrivelled, having bee frosted.

The river as before stated was not in con dition for crossing, and we availed ourselve of the opportunity to consult representative of numerous Doukhobor villages of the Duc Lake district as to their condition; a numbe of interviews were held, to our satisfactior and if the plan can be carried out to have a interview as we return to-morrow, with a per son from another village, only one settlemen will be missed; though this kind of visiting i not what was intended, nor does it fully satisfy

Evidence of material prosperity was show as we took the statistics from some of th men; in one village were thirty-five cows twenty-four oxen and sixteen horses. It wa the desire of the people to have a pair o horses and suitable farming implements fo each quarter-section represented in villages an average of perhaps fifty farms; in order t do this, it would be necessary to borrow money to which they were unaccustomed; they talke about these matters in a business-like, frank manner, also wanted to know something o Friends' principles.

We have statistics from fifty-two villages about forty of which we have visited; among other things a carefully prepared list has been made of those detained in exile in Russia, and there are in all, according to information giv en, one hundred and thirty-seven, including th wives and children of some of the men, and a may naturally be supposed, these men are among the leaders, from intelligence and ability, and their absence in these times is keenly felt. How many aching hearts would be filled with joy i those still in persecution could be liberated, and add their strength to their relations in this free land?

While the general tone of the Doukhobors is hopeful and certainly trustful, and the health of the Cyprus people better, yet there is much to be overcome in the near future. On al sides the desire for seeds is pressing. This matter we intend to take up on our return trip with the authorities of Ottawa. A milling firm in Winnipeg has kindly consented to loan three hundred bushels of flax seed, to be returned from the increase later on. Many horses and oxen have been crippled, and too large a number lost, from a lack of knowledge as to foot and treatment, and on account of the very long trips to which they have been subjected; though a severe instructor, it seems that experience must be the teacher to correct; advice and counsel have been given.

Considerable agitation is shown in the political circles of Canada, the elections being close at hand, which seems but to bring out on the side of the Liberal party, now in power, the many good qualities of the Russian immigrants, who, though poor, are undoubtedly very worthy.

A government fee of ten dollars is charged for each homestead taken up for settlement this, to a people who practically have no money, is a serious matter. The question, however, which immediately confronts us is in endeavoring to provide for the necessities of life to tide over the winter, and until crops can be raised from the ground, bread and water, the former made from a low grade of flour, is the chief diet for the mass of the Doukhobors. Considerably over one thousand bushels of potatoes have been bought from funds sent from our ends; these, also milk, are valuable in preting scurvy, which already is in evidence. quality of the tubers furnished is very d, though it looks as though a fresh stock be necessary for seed, much of the present ply being used for food.

Where potatoes and milk are to be had, a sort oup is made from them; this is poured into sin, and standing or sitting around the small e, the families help themselves, each member being furnished with a large wooden spoon. daily routine of household duties is reduced a minimum. The floors are earthen and oms are mostly made of brush. The top of oven is the favorite place for the little peoin winter, and for the aged and infirm, as for sleeping quarters. We can testify that a good place for warming up. In day time bedding is neatly piled in one package, and ered over with a blanket or spread.

rince Albert is one of the old Hudson Bay pany's posts, established long before the oad brought it into closer touch with the of the world. The Sastkatchewan River ere navigable, and was an important avenue trade. For years the main supplies were ed over land from Winnipeg, five hundred seventy-five miles distant, the charges bethree dollars and fifty cents per one hunl pounds. The town has a population of it two thousand people. Electric lights and phones are among the modern innovations. large saw mills are closed for the winter. ice and Tamarack logs are floated from formany miles up stream, and the finished lumsells at figures nearly the same as in east-Pennsylvania.

he quality of the wheat at the Hudson Bay was much superior to that seen at Rasn; the mill has a daily capacity of one hunbarrels, and is an important distributing t to various posts; also in competition for ant trade. The last car load shipped went New Zealand. Shipments are made to the on district and the far north. Such goods packed in water-proof, duck sacks, ready overland staging, dog-trains or canoes, as case requires. There are no white settlets north of this point. Indians, however, nd, the maps of the northwest are dotted reservations, some embracing but a fracof a township, others are quite large. Canhas arrived at the conclusion that it is per to feed and care for these, her wards, to fight them. There are industrial schools olished by the government, which also asin conducting others, managed by religious nizations, paying a liberal round sum for d of pupils.

wo instances were cited, (and there are ably more), where certain tribes sold this three thousand dollars worth of cattle, ; this goes far towards making them self-orting. The chiefs are paid a moderate ity, and the others a smaller sum; rations ssued to a certain extent, and since 1885, the Indian Insurrection occurred, very trouble has been experienced.

ain, at this season of year here, seldom , but as with us, unexpected things happen, we have had it to-day, somewhat to our dis-Tort; but we have no just cause to complain, The weather has been remarkably fine ughout all of our trip, the mercury keeping the freezing point most of the time—10° above zero being the lowest temperature we have had. The first snow of the season in this locality is falling here this evening. It is usual for winter to set in in earnest by about Eleventh Month, 1st. Many seem to be rather longing for real winter, though it appears to us as a great blessing that the Doukhobors have had such an open fall to complete their houses and stables, which in the majority of cases are in a line of dwellings under one roof. These structures we were often told were to be used, later on, for storehouses and stables. They have usually been erected on each side of a wide avenue, and the more substantial houses are to be added on the side next the street, thus narrowing the present avenue.

TWELFTH MONTH, 1st.—Car Tonquin. C. P. R.R—We were aroused at 3:30 A. M., on the morning of the 29th ult., and about one hour later left Prince Albert on our return to Winnipeg; the trip of about six hundred miles required almost constant travelling until after 2 P.M yesterday, trains on the branch road being largely composed of freight cars. A large pile of smouldering wheat was seen as we moved along, all that remained of one of the many elevators of this country. To-day has been busily spent in Winnipeg. J. S. E. visited some Doukhobor patients in the hospital, and felt well satisfied with their surroundings and treatment.

We were greeted on our return from the Northwest yesterday with a fine budget of home letters, among them came the word of additional car-loads of goods being shipped from Philadelphia. We were in consultation to-day with Commissioner McCreary regarding the disposition of same.

Another large lot of wool was bought with money supplied by our Philadelphia Doukhobor Committee, directions given to ship to different points, and to distribute where investigation showed it was most needed.

While not feeling that the field has been covered, by any means, we have endeavored to do what we could; it has been an exercising time to judge of the merits of the many cases of distress presented, and to administer relief to the best advantage.

After nearly six weeks absence it is pleasant to feel that our faces are turned towards home.

Thy friend,

WM. B. HARVEY.

Items Concerning the Society.

It is proposed to hold four week-day evening meetings for worship at Lansdowne similar to those held last winter. The first will be on the evening of the 19th.

Our Bi-monthly Educational Conference known as the Friends Teachers' Association, last Seventh-day entered into a discussion of Athletics, more especially the Foot-ball question, most of the speakers seeming favorable to the game.

A newspaper, published a good distance from here, gives the following notice:—Union Thanksgiving services will be held here in the Friends' church, Thursday morning at 10.30 o'clock. The Thanksgiving sermon will be preached by Rev. Frank Snyder, pastor of the M. E. church. Music will be furnished by a choir made up from the singers of the various churches in town.

A carload of sugar was on its way to the Doukhobors last week, and a carload of miscellaneous merchandise, including about eight tons of clothing, was ready to be shipped.

Joseph S. Elkinton is now on his way home. Wm. Bellows, of Bristol, England, has had a set of lantern slides prepared to show the Doukhobors in their new settlements. William Evans engaged to exhibit these slides in Media last Fourth-day evening, and William B. Harvey to speak of his experiences in the Northwest.

LEAVE to the Ritualistic
His vestments and perfumes;
Leave to the Calvinistic
His high Synodic fumes;
Leave to the Methodistic
By eloquence to score;
Leave to the Plymouthistic
His wondrous wordy lore.

Thine, Quakor, is the stillness,
Quakor, the feeling thine;
The mystic gift, unbought, unpaid,
The gallery's ordered line,
And thine this note of wisdom,
That woman, with her train
Of balmier moods, and gentler thoughts,
Doth bear co-equal reign.

By JAMES N. RICHARDSON.

Since the Friends church, popularly known as the Quakers, is often confused with the denomination of Shakers, the yearly meeting now being held here [Newberg, Oregon, June 24, 1899] makes the following statement of its origin and brief declaration of faith:

"The Friends church dates its rise about the year 1647, the first churches being established in England. George Fox was the leader in this work The Friends church, popularly known as the 'Quakers,' should not be confused with the denomination known as the 'Shakers,' first founded in this country by Ann Lee in 1774. Between 1826 and 1828 an unfortunate division occurred in the church in this country. Since that time two denominations have existed, each claiming the name of Friends. One of these churches contains a considerable portion who have denied the divinity of Jesus Christ, but the Oregon Friends belong to that branch which believes in the atonement made by Jesus Christ by tasting death for every man. This church also holds the universal priesthood of believers, that each individual may come direct to God and receive every needed blessing without the intervention of human instrumentality, ordinance, rite or ceremony, as, saith the Apostle Paul, 'Ye are washed, ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the spirit of our God.'"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President's Message was sent to Congress on the 5th instant. He urges that the National Banks be authorized to organize with a capital of $25,000. Advocates legislation to perpetuate the gold standard, with authority if necessary thereto to sell bonds; a subsidy to increase our merchant marine; early attention to the injurious effects of trusts; aid in constructing the Nicaraguan Canal; speaks hopefully of satisfactory government being established through Congressional action, in Porto Rico and Cuba; defends the war in the Philippines, asserting that the natives are responsible therefor; claims that order will soon be restored in these islands, and suggests laws for the government of the Hawaiian Islands. He declares that lynching must not be tolerated, and discussed other subjects of minor importance. The message is one of the longest ever presented to any American Congress.

The death of Senator Haywood of Nebraska, was announced in the U. S Senate on the 5th instant.

The report of the Director of the Mint states that the various mints and assay offices in the country handled a greater amount of gold the past year than ever before. Stocks of gold increased over $300,000,000 in the year, and now amount to nearly a billion dollars. The production of gold is increasing at an enormous rate throughout the world.

Few meetings have accomplished so much in a financial way as the one held in New York recently in aid of the Tuskegee Institute. The result thus far is $86,000 contributed to the endowment fund of the Institute, including one check for $25,000, a contribution made by an Ohio woman through ex-President Cleveland. This result is a high tribute to the public confidence in and regard for Booker T. Washington.

Chicago seems to be making a bid for the effects of the publishing firm of Harper & Brothers. The juvenile monthly issued by the firm has been absorbed by a house there, and the announcement is made that the firm have transferred the entire publication of their college and high school text books to the American Book Company, of New York and Chicago. The list of these publications comprises four hundred and fifty works. The price of the transfer is not given out. The corporation of Harper & Brothers will soon cease to exist. Francis C. Cantine has been appointed referee in a proceeding taken for a voluntary dissolution of the corporation. Third Month 28th, 1900, is the date set on which cause may be shown why the firm should not be dissolved.

The enormous destruction of birds to supply trimming for women's hats was clearly shown at the fire recently in a factory at Waugh, L. I., when among the property destroyed were 10,000 stuffed seagulls, 20,000 wings of other birds and 10,000 heads of birds representing varieties from the plumed birds of the South to the ordinary Long Island crow.

A destructive fire occurred on the 10th instant at Augusta, Ga. The Masonic Temple, Arlington Hotel and several large stores were destroyed, causing $1,000,000 damage.

Professor G. W. Hough, of the Fort Dearborn Observatory, Northwestern University, has discovered Tau Taueri to be a double star. The companion star is one of the ninth magnitude and was discovered while Professor Hough was observing an occultation of the moon. The discovery of the double star has been registered with the Astronomical Society. Professor Hough claims the distinction of having registered more double stars with the Astronomical Society than any other astronomer in the world.

The Chicago Tribune says: "The bicycle as a fad has already become a thing of the past. Utility has taken the place of enthusiasm, and the wheel has ceased to be a craze. It still has a future as an excellent method of exercise when reasonably used, and of quick locomotion. The Baltimore Sun, looking into the statistics of the trade, finds there has been a heavy decline in exports from this country, notwithstanding the great decline in prices, and that original investors in cycle works have met with great losses. The same is true in England. In the first eight months of 1895 that country sold abroad $5,350,000 worth of bicycles, and in 1896 sold $5,946,500, but a decline set in in 1897, and in the first eight months of 1899 it sold only $2,393,500 worth. Of the companies organized in England in 1896 and since, forty with shares aggregating $13,750,000 have gone into liquidation. Shares of 36 leading companies show falls aggregating 30 per cent., some falling as much as 75 per cent. The common stock of such companies is now almost absolutely worthless. Probably this is the history of the trade all over. But within certain limits the bicycle will continue to be used. It may not be seen so frequently in the parks and on the boulevards as a pleasure vehicle, but as a means of getting quickly from one locality to another, it is still the ideal method of locomotion. Like everything else, the novelty once worn off, it has come to the demands of practical use, and that is its future. It will be used but not abused."

There were 412 deaths in this city last week, which is 2 more than the previous week and 24 less than the corresponding week of 1898. Of the whole number, 203 were males and 209 females: 64 died of pneumonia; 56 of consumption; 43 of heart diseases; 23 of diphtheria; 21 of apoplexy; 18 of nephritis; 17 of cancer; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of convulsions; 10 of inanition; 8 of Bright's disease, and 6 of Œdema of the Lungs.

FOREIGN.—The official figure as to the consumption of coal in Great Britain last year is 157,000,000 tons.

The Berlin correspondent of the London Standard says: "All the Powers concerned have favorably received the proposals of the United States regarding the maintenance of the 'open door' in China, each offering to sign the desired assurance if the others will do so."

A despatch from Berlin says Germany has given assurance of her willingness to maintain the open trade door in far Asia, and sign a guarantee to that effect.

Cablegrams received in London from Pretoria report that fighting began on the 10th inst. north of Modder River between General Methuen's forces and the Boers under Cronje.

Cablegrams from Cape Town received in London tell of a desperate fight at Stormberg, Cape Colony, between 3,000 British troops, led by General Gatacre, on his way to the support of Lord Methuen's army, advancing to Kimberley. Gatacre was misled by his guides, fiercely attacked and compelled to retire. The British list of killed and wounded is a large one. A despatch from Pretoria says 672 British prisoners were taken at Stormberg.

Sixty-six mining companies at Johannesburg, South Africa, have suspended operations on account of the war, and as a result many families are destitute.

The Chicago Tribune says: "London Truth has been calculating how long the Witwatersrand gold mines will continue to attract 'outlanders' to the region for which so many men are now laying down their lives. The Rand is a limited deposit of gold bearing earth and rock, extending about twenty miles around Johannesburg. The ore runs so evenly that the output can be calculated for years ahead. A consensus of the best experts places the total future yield of the Rand at £483,000,000. John Hays Hammond estimates the probable annual yield at £20,000,000. On this basis the entire deposit will be exhausted in twenty-four years. It is more than likely that the new influx of men and of improved machinery after the present war will considerably shorten this period. The sum of gold is great, but what will become of the British mining population after the mines are worked out? The outlanders will pack up their belongings and leave the country. They will have neither gain the franchise nor for the arid veldt wrested from the Dutch farmers. In the light of this probable course of events, the present 'grievances' of the British seem comparatively temporary. The blood-stains and bitterness that the war will leave in Dutch South Africa may in the end cost even more than the wealth of the Witwatersrand can repay."

General Gregorio del Pilar, commanding Aguinaldo's body guard, was killed in a fight northwest of Cervantes on First Month 3rd.

The American military and naval forces have occupied the naval station of Olongapo and the town of Subig, on Subig Bay. The Filipines fled, making practically no resistance.

An official despatch to Madrid from Manila says that 229 Spaniards, who were formerly prisoners in the hands of the Filipinos, have arrived there.

For some time past no paper money has been sent to the Philippines to pay the army. This is mainly due to the fact that it was found considerable loss was likely to be sustained by paymasters and other disbursing officers through the operations of the red ants that infest the country. These little pests attacked the greenbacks so voraciously and so effectively that the disbursing officers became very much alarmed for the safety of the public funds, and upon their recommendation further shipment of paper money was stopped and coin substituted. The aggregate required to pay the army in the Philippines is now about $1,000,000 per month, and this is sent in gold and silver coin.

In regard to automobiles, France leads in gasoline vehicles and England in steam vehicles, while America, as was to be expected, is far in the lead in electrical conveyances of all kinds. Six different motive powers are now actually employed in this country—electricity, steam, compressed air, carbonic acid gas and alcohol.

All eastern Germany is snowbound, and the cold is intense. Koenigsberg reports five inches of ice, and in the province of Posen several persons have been frozen to death.

A large number of women students has lately been received into the Swiss universities. The Neuchatel Academy has 937; Geneva has 292; Zurich, 231; Berne, 172; Lausanne, 130; Neuchatel, 52; Bale, 35, and Fribourg, 25. Most of them are enrolled in the faculties of medicine and philosophy.

First-days and holidays reduce the number of work days in Russia to 268 a year.

In spite of the fact that more political prisoners now live in Siberia than ever before, the Russian Governme has diminished the sum for their maintenance from $15 000 to $50,000.

Private advices received in Constantinople report th the Kurds have avenged the recent incursion of Russi Armenians into the Alashgerd district, in Turkish Arm nia, by pillaging the Armenian village of Kestur and m sacring 300 of its inhabitants.

The soil of Egypt at the present day is tilled by exact the same kind of plow that was used 5,000 years ago.

The cultivation of coffee on the northern coasts Queensland is stated to be becoming an important ind try. Growers are said to be making preparations to e port to Britain coffee in a ground and tinned condition.

A private despatch to the Public Ledger, dated Lim Peru, Twelfth Month, 9th, states that on Eleventh Mont 21st, an immense aerolite fell at Cochabomba, Boliv causing a panic among the inhabitants of that city.

It is computed the death rate of the world is 67 a the birth rate 70 a minute, and this seeming light perce tage of gain is sufficient to give a net increase in popu tion each year of 1,200,000 souls.

Lonesome Work.

You are your own workmanship," says the gion of self-culture, from Buddhism down to e present professions of Christianity. "Ye God's workmanship," says the religion of st. "You are your own character-builders," the one. "Ye are God's building," says other. "Work out your own salvation," the one, and there stops short. "For it od that worketh in you," the gospel goes o show as the right foundation of right . There is no self-sustained motion. Per- al motion is inherent in nothing that moves in the Almighty.

et there is a place for the self-culture of teousness,—a place to fall in if standing tself, a place to rise in if working together God. The gospel which says, "we are his kmanship," livingly dispenses to us our own in workmanship, and is far from dispensing it. It gives us good things often with own hands,—not often in our slothful- . It calls for all the strenuous work of lest life exercised in co-operation with the ter-builder. "As laborers together with we beseech you that ye receive not the e of God in vain." When not occupied the labor required, his grace, if received, eceived idly and in vain. "Ye are God's bandry, ye are God's building,"—"his work- ship, created in Christ Jesus unto good ks, which God hath ordained, that ye should k in them" (Eph. ii: 11).

is not good for good works to live alone. hout Christ they cease to live, or be good. rt from Him we can do nothing in the work ur own or others' salvation. His assurance hat "he that gathereth not with me, scat- th." Some of the Yearly Meetings' discip- s query for diligence "in gathering to st." They will be more scriptural when ed to read, "gathering with Christ." works that are really good, labor that is really gospel labor, is always co-labor. We do not have to do it alone. We have a true yoke-fellow who says, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me." A sense of working together with Him, or sharing his yoke, makes the yoke easy; a sense of suffering with Him,—which has the promise of reigning with Him,—makes the burden light.

If any man through "repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ," comes to be in Christ Jesus, "he is a new creature," and created in Christ Jesus unto good works. These are of that new growth which the new life puts forth. Eternal life is not their earnings, but their producer; a gift, and not the wages of our works. Works of sin have their wages, namely, death. But our Saviour having tasted this for every man, opened a door of hope for the repenting sinner. Bought with a price to serve him who first loved us, we answer Him in the love which, shirking not the cross, yet makes the yoke of service easy, and as kept alive "is the fulfilling of the law."

The Christian's work, then, is never solitary; his character-building never independent; his suffering never without sympathy. In these he enjoys a holy partnership. As his every duty is the Lord's work it is done as in his sight, his co-operation and fellowship. Let ours be the willingness and obedience, his will be the power; ours the obedience, his the knowledge of the purpose. Faithfully discharging our next duty, we are building more wisely than we know. "What I do" through thy hands "thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." Though alone, thou workest not alone, for the Father is with thee.

Friends interested in the early history of Pennsylvania, will find pleasure in reading two volumes by Dr. A. S. Bolles. They cover the period from 1609 when Hudson discovered Delaware Bay to 1790, when a new constitution for the State was adopted. The second volume is largely made up of special chapters on Immigration Trade, Religion, etc. Friends are given sympathetic treatment throughout, and their large share in making the Province and State is fully recognized. It is probably the best history of Pennsylvania since Proud's and of course is much more extensive than that author's.

The history of the State which will follow is expected to take two or three volumes more.

"The Canadian Doukhobor Settlements." A Series of Letters by Lally Bernard, Toronto: William Briggs, 1899, (69 pages, price 15 cents.)

This is a very interesting recital of what the author experienced and witnessed during her visits throughout the Doukhobor colonies of Canada from Eighth to Twelfth Month, 1899. No one who has been interested in the accounts given from time to time in these columns by our Friends who have visited that people, would fail to read this fresh account also with unflagging attention. Copies may be had through Joseph Elkinton of Media, or at 817 Mifflin St., Philadelphia.

For "THE FRIEND."

Friends and the Indians of Pennsylvania.

Shortly after this, viz: in the Sixth Month 1773, The Meeting for Sufferings was informed that Zebulon Heston of Wrightstown, in Bucks Co., had a prospect of religious service among the Delaware Indians, settled to the westward of Penna., and that John Parrish of Phila., was concerned to accompany him. These Friends had both been liberated for the visit by their respective Monthly Meetings. The Meeting for Sufferings believed it right to prepare an epistle to these Indians and forward it to them by these Friends. This communication appears to be the last which Friends in their collective capacity addressed to these Indians. The Revolutionary war prevented further intercourse on either side, and in the year 1782, another massacre of friendly Indians took place, and emigration of the Delawares beyond the Mississippi began. The address to these Indians above referred to is as follows:

To Netawattwalemum, and the rest of the head men of the Delaware Indians at Kekailammapaiking, and to John Papunehang, and the rest of the Indian brethren at the Welhick Thuppeak, and all other Indians living beyond the Ohio to whom these may come.

Brethren: Your friends the people called Quakers in Penna. and New Jersey often remember you with desires for your welfare and true happiness and that the old friendship which was made between your fathers and ours, may still be maintained, and may ever continue between your and our children and grandchildren from one generation to another. Then it will always be pleasing to us to hear from and to see one another.

Brethren: The several messages received from you by our brothers Kilbuck and Joseph Peepy, last year and the year before, made deep impressions on the minds of such of us as were present when they were delivered, and have often since excited our thoughts of them. We in our answers, informed you we were in hopes the love of God through our Lord and Saviour

Jesus Christ, would engage and constrain some of the ministers of the Gospel to visit you, and until such should be thus sent among you, we desired you to attend diligently to the instructions of the Spirit of Christ within you by which you may come to know your duty to God and one unto another.

Brethren: We are all of us unable rightly to obtain this saving knowledge by our own wisdom and strength. We should therefore humbly and diligently wait for the Spirit of Christ to enlighten our minds and to give us the right understanding by which we may see that in the state of nature we are weak, blind, and miserable, and can never come to a state of true happiness without a Saviour, and if we received this understanding with thankful hearts, and sincerely desire the help of Christ our Saviour, He will, by the renewed working of his good spirit instruct us more and more.

Brethren: The ministers of Christ who are really led by his Spirit, and faithfully attend to his instructions may be useful, and a great help to others by informing them what they have tasted and felt of his love, and when they speak from the constraints of that love are often instrumental to raise the living sense of it in those to whom they speak; but all they can do, or should desire to do, is to bring men to Christ, that they may know and feel Him for themselves, as He is graciously manifesting himself by his spirit within them; for that which is to be known of God is manifested within, and without this knowledge no outward performance of any kind will work out their salvation and bring them from a state of nature to a state of grace, wherein they may witness salvation through the blood of Christ which was shed for the redemption of all men. We fervently desire you may come truly to know and experience this, every one of you, in and for yourselves, for no man can do this work for his brother nor for his nearest friend.

Brethren: We write this to you by our beloved friend Zebulon Heston, whose mind being influenced with the love of Christ, and constrained thereby, engages him to go and visit you, being desirous, though an old man, to see you before he dies, and to express something of the goodness of God, which he hath known to preserve him from his youth to this day. He hath approved himself a faithful minister of Christ both in word and doctrine, and in life and conversation, and we hope you will receive him as our true friend and brother. As the journey is long he is accompanied by our friend and brother John Parrish, whose love to you is so great that he is willing likewise to go and see you. We sincerely desire and pray that they may be instrumental to do you good, and that the blessing of God may attend you and them, and that you may show forth to them that first mark of the disciples of Christ, which is true love unto one another.

Your desire of having some religious instructors for your children we very heartily approve, and as you have been before informed whenever we can find any rightly qualified and willing to undertake the service, we intend to assist and encourage them in it.

The letter from John Papunehang and his brethren at Welhick Thuppeak was lately sent to some of us by John Etwein, and it is very pleasing to us to hear of your prosperity and settlement there, the increase of which we sincerely desire. In much brotherly love we salute you and are your friends and brethren.

Signed by twenty-four Friends.

In the Ninth Month 25th, 1773, Zebulon Heston and John Parrish having safely arrived from their visit to the Indians gave an account to the Meeting of their preservation through the journey, their kind reception among the Indians and their satisfaction with their visit. They also stated that they had had a public meeting with the Indians and read the epistle of the Meeting to them, and they delivered to the meeting the following letter from the Indians in reply to it:—

Kekailammapaikung, 28th of Seventh Month, 1773, after a meeting held for Divine Worship, Captain Whiteeyes spoke as follows:

We are glad and rejoiced in our hearts to see our brothers the Quakers standing speaking before us, and what you have said we believe to be right and we heartily join in with it; Since our Saviour came a light into the world, there has been a great stir amongst the people about religion, some are for one way, and some for another. We have had offers of religion many times but would not accept of it, till we see our brothers the Quakers, and hear what they would say to us, and now you have come and opened the road. We have heard what you have said, and we felt the grace that was in your hearts, conveyed to us. We think that as we two brothers the Quakers and the Delawares were brought up together as the children of one man, it is our Saviour's will, we should be of one religion, now you have come and opened the road, we expect to see the way from town to town, quite over to the great king (meaning the king of Great Britain, etc.) over the water, then our king will know that the Quakers and Delawares are as one man and make one religion. We are poor and weak and not able to judge for ourselves, and when we think of our children it makes us sorry. We hope you will instruct us in the right way both in things of this life as well as the world to come. Now what we have said we hope to be strengthened to abide by. They then delivered the belt.

The Meeting for Sufferings in their Minute made on the occasion state that the letter was "very satisfactory and excites thankfulness to consider that the good Spirit of God is at work in the minds of the Indians in order to bring them into a nearer acquaintance with Him and also for the support and preservation experienced by these Friends in their journey and visit."

The most distant settlement of Indians they were at was, they thought, about one hundred and twenty miles beyond the Ohio.

THE INDISPENSABLE PRINCIPLE. — Nothing can dim the glory of our (Society's) fundamental principle; nothing can deprive us of the ground already won, for witnessing to the possibility of combining the freest thought with the purest devotion. The faith of the future, the faith we are all in our various measures seeking after and struggling for; the faith which is needed to satisfy the growing hunger of the world for truth; the faith which is deep enough to meet reason at its very source—this faith may not break forth from within our borders, but when it comes it can do no more and no less than reaffirm our fundamental principle—the single and all-sufficient trust in God's perennial inspiration, and im diate revelation of himself to human hearts *Caroline E. Shoes of the World.

An exchange gives some interesting fa about shoes:

The Portuguese shoe has a wooden sole heel with vamp made of patent leather, fa fully showing the flesh side of the skin.

The Persian footgear is a raised shoe, is often a foot high. It is made of light wo richly inlaid, with a strap extending over instep.

The Algerian shoe in appearance is not like the light English wooden clogs. This s is made entirely of leather, in the simpl form, and usually without any kind of or mentation.

The American shoe has a leather sole heel, without a counter and back quart The vamp is made of felt, and is beautifu ornamented with needlework, done in colo silk thread.

The Muscovite shoe is hand woven o wooden frame, but little attention being p to the shape of the foot. Leather is so times used, but the sandal is generally m of colored silk cordage and woolen cloth.

The Siam shoe has the form of an ancie canoe, with a gondola bow and an open t The sole is made of wood, and the upper of laid wood and cloth, and the exterior is elab rately ornamented in colors, and with gold a silver.

The Mussulman's shoe is of heavy leathe It is adjusted to the foot by a wide leath strap which runs from the heel and buckl over the instep. The only ornamentation the fastening of two feather plumes on t right side of the toe.

The sandal worn by the Egyptians is co posed of a sole made by sticking together thr thicknesses of leather. This is held to t foot by a band passing across the inste The sandal is beautifully stitched with threa of different colors.

The Grecian shoe is made almost entir of leather, and has a thickly padded sole wi a sharp turner-up toe, which is surmounted a large ball of colored wool or hair. The sh is fleece lined, and is gorgeously decorat with beads and ornamental stitching.

"Weak and Beggarly Elements."

aving read an article by W. Tallack, in h he takes exception to the application of above language to baptism and the Lord's per, so-called, my mind turned to an expe-ce I passed through now more than forty s ago, when I became a communicant in the gregational body.

om a belief that it was my duty I became rticipant in that outward ordinance, it being common and accepted belief among those whom I was reared and with whom I asso-d. I cannot forget the sense of disappoint-that was my experience in so doing. I cted help spiritually, and being very desir-o obey every requirement, and to mainfest ve and allegiance to my Saviour, hoped d a deeper discovery of Himself to my soul by.

t, no; nothing but barrenness and disap-ment was my lot therein. I found not Him my soul more intimately longed after in utward way. The truth was, there had al-been experienced the supping with Him fe with me, and having begun in the spirit seeking to be made more perfect by the exercise of the mind in this external com-on.

eat was my perplexity, and not till I met some of the writings of Friends did I have ystery of what I had passed through clears led to my closer fellowship with the ers of the Society of Friends then known in the city of London, and ultimately to ecoming a member of that body.

ad found how weak and beggarly to me utward rite was, and I knew from expe-e how far from fulfilment were the prom-ny God-father, so-called, had undertaken behalf—"the renouncing of the devil and s works, the pomps and vanities of this d world and all the sinful lusts of the for, alas, I experienced these were still in me, and notwithstanding having expe-d dominion, in a measure, by the govern-d controlling power of Divine grace, I did eep the good estate thus gained, but gave o evil.

vas then doubt and other evils, the out-of transgressions, took possession of my and acting under the influence of my own and will, I resolved to resign my member-n the Society of Friends.

as permitted to follow my own devices to ain degree, and while the Friends of those and of the meeting to which I belonged, ry meeting of which the Friend is a mem-ho has been the moving cause of my g this letter, received my resignation, and cord on their books of those days will es-n the reality of my action, they wisely de-accepting it, until time should prove was to be the outcome thereof.

the time I pressed forward in my retro-course, and applied to be received a mem-another body of professing Christians. I oide the garb of a Friend, discontinued the the plain language. In a word, tried to t as other people.

first awakening to where I was travel-vas to find the power to govern my violent l temper was largely lost, and I was to hang my head with very shame. I had taken the government of myself into my own hands, and God was leaving me to reap the fruits thereof.

In short, I was being taught that obedience to the law of God, in the heart, was of far greater moment than any sacrifice to please my own mind about the so-called outward ordinances. I had made up my mind to be a member again of a community who were engaged to obey our Saviour's injunction: "This do in remembrance of me," as they stated, by being partakers of the tokens of his broken body.

Without in any wise being the judge of motives that actuate others in these matters, it had been made plain to me that what availed Godward was the receiving of Christ into the heart, so as to know obedience unto Him, the feeding upon him that makes wise unto salvation.

For the work of Christ is the fruit of his spirit. It was so with Him as He tabernacled upon earth among men, either in life or in death. Theories, apart from life, are but words, and can do nothing for us. Hence, his words were spirit and life because they emanated therefrom. They were wrought in God, and produced fruit well-pleasing to God.

As it was in the head so is it in all the members of the one body. There is difference of degree as well as of growth and perception.

A sickly plant is a plant, because the life of the plant is in it, but if dead it is good for nothing.

So a Christian man or woman, acting in any measure under or from the spirit of Christ, is not wholly dead, however imperfect that life may be, but when severed by disloyalty and disobedience, begins to die at the root.

Such was my position at that time. It was not being overtaken in a fault, it was deliberately going contrary to knowledge and trying to pin my faith to the holding of others on what they considered the teaching of Scripture, instead of obeying the soul-saving injunction of Christ: "What is that to thee? Follow thou me."

Well, to return to my narrative, the day drew near, that was called Sacrament Sunday, and my trouble of mind grew apace. Truly the terrors of his broken law were upon me, and in anguish of soul I was made to feel, if I dared to go back and again became a partaker of what I knew to me was an empty shadow, God's mercy would forsake me, perhaps forever.

This brought me to my knees to seek pardon, and I had to undo all I had done.

The next First-day found me again at Devonshire-house Meeting, humbled and broken down. Again I had to put on what I had put off. And had to drink the cup, to me a bitter cup, to the dregs, in the face of a multitude of working men, who openly and secretly laughed at me.

Now I can truly say, from experience: These beggarly elements to which I sought again to be brought into bondage, God, in mercy to my soul, did not permit.

I do remember the prayer in very early life. I again and again prayed, when I saw or heard how so many made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience toward God: "That God would in his mercy so follow me, and that if I would not bow to his mercy He would compel me by his judgments."

God heard and answered that prayer.

I have not much more to say, only let all beware how they lean to their own understanding, rather than to the gentle, yet powerful reproofs, of and from the spirit of the Lord. It is not so much a matter of what may appear right in the eyes of our fellow-beings, as what has the Master's approbation. That secret exercise of soul that leads to doing or to leaving undone what is well-pleasing to Him. There is an exercise to be passed through for our own refinement. Happy are they that abide in faith and faithfulness.

Now faith is that which springs from the sense and inner consciousness of God that embraces in itself both past and present, in the work of God, both in us and for us, and we therein and thereby yield our all to Him.

Had the teachers of religion thus taught obedience by reception, we would not now have to behold those who make profession of the faith of Christ, engaged in deadly struggle with each other. If shadow is put in the place of substance we must, of necessity, reap even as we sow, the fruit of our own doings.

There may be some who will read this and find that therein that will help on the way, even heavenward. CHARLES W. THOMSON.

The Grandmother's Place.

She was a dear, white-haired old lady—the very ideal of a grandmother, and she sat by the fireside rocking slowly, but with a sad look on her gentle face.

"No, dearie, I'm not sick, but I do feel lonely sometimes."

But why should she be lonely? She was in a family of well-bred young people—son and daughter and grandchildren of various ages. To be sure, many of her dear ones had gone across the river to the Father's house; but she was not of a melancholy temperament, so she did not brood over that.

She loved the young people. She would have liked to join in their merriment; she would have gone with them to some of the concerts and other places, if she had been asked. But they in their thoughtlessness never imagined that grandmother cared for such things, and so they sat talking over their plans, telling merry tales and jokes, but leaving grandmother out of the conversation altogether.

They were never unkind to her. She had the best room in the house. Her bodily comfort was attended to first, her wishes were immediately carried out. But she would have gladly given up all this to have had one of those bright-faced boys or girls for a companion. If they would have only sat down and told her some of their stories and plans, how glad she would have been; and she had pleasant stories to tell, too, if there were some one to listen and care.

But she sat by the fire with a shadow on her lovely old face, and said, "I am so lonely sometimes." I wish they could all have heard it, and understand the pathos of it. It will not be long till grandmother's chair will be vacant. She has spent her life in ministry for others. Common gratitude would demand that her last days should not be lonely and companionless. Love the grandmother; give her a place in your heart as well as your home, and make her closing hours her happiest.—Selected.

INDIAN SUMMER THOUGHTS.

Thrice welcome, Indian Summer,
The crowning of the year,
With regal wreaths of autumn
And with her leaflets sere!
I love the gentle sunshine,
The softened, mellow haze,
That skirts the wide horizon,
These Indian Summer days.

I love the greening wheat-fields,
The golden yellow corn
Piled by the busy huskers,
At work since early morn;
The red and golden apples
Grown ripe in sunny rays,
Then stored for hours of winter
Through Indian Summer days.

I love the warbling songsters
That sweetly tell of spring,
The crickets' busy chirpings
Which olden memories bring.
The crows are coarsely cawing
In field and woodland ways,
And yet I love to hear them
These Indian Summer days.

I love the floating cloudlets
In azure fields above,
The moon-lit skies unclouded,
The starry hosts I love.
The calm, the precious stillness
That broods o'er all, and stays
As night is closing round us,
These Indian Summer days.

I love the early morning,
Before the busy hum
Of hours of active labor
To toiling hands has come;
And yet I love to labor,
And sing of labor's praise
As one of God's best blessings,
These Indian Summer days.

The moonlight, soft and tender,
Adds beauty to the scene
As, in her modest splendor
She glides, a royal queen.
I love the melting sunlight,
Each shadow as it plays
In soft and gentle ripples
Through Indian Summer days.

I love the gentle breezes,
By which our brows are fanned,
Which scatter leaves like carpets
Upon the waiting land.
When on the barren branches
Erelong my eyes shall gaze
In loving thought I'll ponder
On Indian Summer days.

I love the autumn flowerets
That bloom in ways untrod,
The white and pale blue aster,
The yellow golden-rod.
I love them for their beauty
And for their modest ways
That grace the fields and woodlands
Through Indian Summer days.

I love the ferns that flourish
Along the deep ravine,
The mosses and the lichens
In simple beauty seen.
The whole bright face of nature
A grandeur rare displays,
And tells of our Creator,
These Indian Summer days.

I love the autumn leaflets,
The beauties manifold
Of crimson leaves and mottled,
Of russet, red and gold.
I love the grand old forests
With splendor all ablaze,
That clothe the hills and valleys
These Indian Summer days.

And while I see the leaflets
Borne downward by the breeze,
And mark the buds enfolded
For others such as these,
My heart is filled with rapture
And wonder as I gaze,
And lessons sweet are taught me
In Indian Summer days.

For, as when leaves have fallen
Their mission is not done,
Thus may our life here ended
Be Heavenly life begun.
So from my heart is welling
A hymn of thankful praise
For beauties and for lessons
Of Indian Summer days.

Ah! sweetly do the leaflets
As to the earth they fall
Tell us our loving Father
Makes beauty for us all.
And, as the frosts are needed
Ere we enraptured gaze
On crimson leaves and golden
Of Indian Summer days.

'Tis thus I think our Father,
Who wisely placed us here
To love and serve and trust Him
More fully, year by year,
Sends trials and afflictions
On all his children's ways,
To fit us for the blessings
And joys of Heavenly days. S. D. S.

Number 135.

It is related of a certain housekeeper that after she had complained several times to the grocer regarding baskets of unsound fruit sent to her address, she was one day offered a basket of peaches and a basket of gem melons, accompanied with this assurance:

"You will not find a single damaged peach or melon in either of these packages. If you do, I will gladly refund the money you pay for them."

She found every peach and melon perfect. The housekeeper reported this on her next visit to the dealer's store, and asked why he was so positive in warranting his goods. "Why?" exclaimed the man. "Why, because I have found that the farmer who furnished those baskets never sends dishonest packages to market."

The farmer's number among the commission dealer's consignments was "135." After that the lady always bought No. 135, and the contents of the baskets never failed in measure, condition or in quality.

Admiration for the conscientious farmer grew upon the housekeeper and literally made her more conscientious herself. She felt ashamed whenever she was tempted to slight her work. No. 135 seemed to be looking at her.

One particular that deepened this impression was the non-appearance in market on Mondays of any baskets bearing the favorite mark. Farmer 135 would not pack fruit on Sundays, the dealer said. The housekeeper felt her face flush when that was said. She never had been so scrupulous.

The summer and autumn passed, but the sermon of the faultless fruit continued to preach to its buyer when she could buy no more. Careless lapses of duty frequently brought up the thought, "No. 135 would not have done that." She remembered and thanked the unknown man whose integrity had strengthened and helped her. His rectitude represented to her the presence of the sinless Teacher.

The above instance is but one among thousands of the power of involuntary influence. A good man's life is one of the moral tonics of society. His silent example is in itself a blessing to the world.—Baptist Union.

Foot Ball Games.

The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of Twelfth Month 5th, 1899, publishes a list, collected by itself, of eleven deaths, and sixty-seven serious injuries due directly to foot ball playing during the season of 1899. How many minor injuries occurred which were not reported, cannot be told. This list shows that the American school boy, or student, has pretty good chances of premature death, or of needless crippling, which his Creator never designed for him.

The "serious injuries" reported, show a long list of broken limbs, collar bones and ribs; broken shoulder blades, fractured hips, concussion of the brain, and so on. The deaths have resulted from kicks in the head, ruptured lungs, fractured skulls, concussion of the brain, twisted spine, or internal injuries.

Most of the combats, wherein these accidents occurred, were enacted before crowds of enthusiastic spectators, who cheered their favorites, and when the games were over, would be so filled with excitement, as to find it almost impossible, for a time, to think or speak of anything else. The games are so likely to be attended with serious results, that physicians are on hand to afford relief to the wounded. And this in a Christian nation, which protests that the bull fights of Spain are very dreadful things.

In old Roman days, the arena would be thronged with the populace, which went wild over the gladiatorial games presented. The thought obtained that virility and nation vigor were subserved by such scenes. The people attended, expecting to see contests involving physical strength and skill, where some would be hurt, or possibly killed. The close of this century witnesses a somewhat equivalent madness in our large cities. The spectators are somewhat like those old Romans whose ways they would repudiate; for they view foot ball games, knowing that the participants may possibly be very seriously damaged.

We are not so far advanced over third century ideas after all—the difference seems to be largely one of degree. Undoubtedly the moral effects upon the Christian of such crowds and excitement, are often most disastrous.

What are our Friends' schools doing in this game-madness, which a few years hence will be condemned by history, and which is to-day censured by many thinking men? Are our schools being caught with the fever? Are we careful to show, that as Christians, we cannot encourage the students under our control, to engage in sports with scholars of other Institutions where the profession to maintain the moral and spiritual life is not as high, as in our own colleges and academies? Are we exhibiting a moderation to all men, grounded in a living belief that the Lord is at hand? Is the spiritual life of our young people being guarded by teachers and parents during this craze? Are we watchful that whilst fully encouraging recreation and sports, under morally healthful influences, we do not, either as spectators or players, participate in the excitement of games before crowds, so as to impair our own spiritual vitality or invite the criticism of thoughtful Christians about us?

Account of John and Mary Hampton.

ose were the days of quiltings, cornhusk- and apple parings; and I found myself y perplexed by receiving at about the same invitations to be present at a quilting at of the homes of these young women, (they not have been quiltings), the day appointed the same from each, I felt that my time ecide between them had come; that my e for life depended upon my acceptance e or the other of these invitations. What I to do? I must not blindly choose. I p earnest petitions for guidance, but no shined into my heart. The day before the s were to come off, had come, and great ny exercise of soul; but a secret trustful- that I would be guided filled my heart, gh I little thought it was to be decided by mstances as wholly from under my con- ıs life and death would be. The morning ; still I was in darkness, but still hopeful prayerful. I was in the practice of bleed- people, and as the day advanced a mes- er arrived from a house near one of these g women, with the request that I should immediately to bleed a person there. t now broke in like a flood! I could not this person and attend the quilting at a several miles in an opposite direction, y going there I would be in easy reach of ne at the home of Mary Williams. With xfulness of heart I performed my errand e home of the sick man, and went to the est quilting, feeling satisfied with the e so plainly made for me by Divine wis- as I believe, and which I ever after felt my own choice also. Before the day was I told her that I had some notion of visit- ner and found her willing, which I had ted would be the case, so fully did I believe, that time on, that she was the right one me. We were married Fifth Month 5th, , when I was little past twenty-four, and ighteen years of age."

resume his own written narrative will us back a little. He continues it thus:

In 1828 when I was in the twenty-third of my age, I was brought into a close ex- e on account of divisions in our society. e being no separation in the meeting I attended, I went with the current and or thought little about it. But circum- ces were such that it seemed right for me o to live with my brother at Plainfield, re there had been a division, my brother g with the party which held the old meet- house. I then knew not what to do, and ix weeks went to no meeting. But every my grief increased until my appetite and leep were almost taken from me.

As I could not see which meeting to attend, feeling that it was not right to quit meet- I concluded to start on foot and alone and ast both meetings, and unless favored to which to attend, go and hold my meeting log in the woods. Under agitated feelings ked on and came to the old meeting house e I had attended when living there a few a before.

All was still, (it being early), but I could o liberty to stop there, so on I went much cting to go into the woods for my meeting. When I came to within a few steps of the other meeting house a gleam of comfort came over me, and I felt a willingness to turn in, which I did, and had such a comfortable meeting that I have never doubted since but that Orthodox Friends are the right ones for me. When I was about thirty, He who had followed me, and often called for more dedication, broke in upon me in a wonderful manner. He called for unreserved obedience, and I was contrited before Him and renewed covenant that if He would be with me I would serve Him. He then showed me that if I would be faithful I must speak of Him in the assemblies of his people. And being at meeting one day a few words were presented to my mind to deliver, but I let in the reasoner until the meeting closed. I felt rather uncomfortable, but thought that if I were visited in like manner again I would be faithful. In a short time after this, as I was sitting in an humble frame of mind, I was again called on to utter a few words, but I shrank from it and reasoned until meeting broke. Here condemnation seized me, for I had resolved to be obedient and give up to what He required of me, but now I had disobeyed and his presence was withheld from me for a season. I felt, however, that it was not wilful disobedience. I often thought of Uizza, and was very earnest that I might not put forth unbidden, and in time felt pretty comfortable again; and for some years enjoyed much satisfaction in my family and above all, sweet peace, insomuch that it seemed many times that my cup overflowed with thanksgiving and praise for his loving kindness to me, a poor weak creature as I felt myself to be, and I concluded that I should never be called upon in that way again. But as I was in the meeting one day a powerful visitation came over me, and I felt called upon to speak, but I was so fearful of bringing dishonor to the great cause that I reasoned it away and went home sorrowful, but promised that if I was again favored I would be faithful. So the next meeting day the matter was again presented to my mind and I raised my hand and took hold of the back of the bench before me to rise and deliver what was presented, but oh, sad to relate! fear again got the victory, and I left in distress. I went home heavy and sad. I knew not what to do. I dared not promise for I knew I had broken my promise and I felt no power to renew it. While I was bemoaning my condition, a language as plain, said: "Thy crown is taken from thee." So plain was this that it went to the heart and seemed to thrill in every vein; and oh, none can tell; only those who have passed through similar trials, how I suffered! I was left alone, seemingly forsaken, and much distressed; and for years did I wander far and wide, beset with temptations of various kinds, at times almost ready to conclude there was no God."

After describing an unusual dispensation in which he felt that he had been unfaithful, he says:

"I still attended meeting, but with scarcely ever a ray of light or true peace. Those comfortable feelings were gone; and when at meeting I would try to collect my mind inward I would be so overcome with drowsiness that I had no comfort, and I nearly resolved to quit going to meeting. And one First-day I wandered off alone, but under very different feelings from what I had when taking many a lonely walk in my youthful days, for then I felt peace and comfort, but now distress and bitterness of spirit. When I returned home, my dear companion, (who, I suppose, felt distressed about me, though I told her nothing at that time), presented me with a paper that I had written several years before, for I had in my seasons of good penned quite a number of pieces expressive of my feelings, which in these dark hours had all been destroyed but this one. And as she handed it to me, observed that she thought I did not feel as I did when I wrote that. Oh, none can tell my feelings! I took the paper with disdain, and read it with remorse and in hardness of heart, for I could feel nothing in unison with what was there written. I keenly felt that I was not in the situation I once was in. How many days I remained in this dark state after that! but I think not long. As I was on a log one day, (and it seems to me I can remember the very log to this time), musing on my condition, all at once a ray of comfort came over me, and I could again drop a tear from an eye that had, as it were, been closed for years. And as I had a taste I craved for more of the living breath, and He, who had watched ever me all this time, condescended to favor me with his presence again, in which I took great delight.

The Tendency of Our Conversation.

A Friend has forwarded the following, copied from an old volume of THE FRIEND, for re-insertion:

"I am often led to observe the tendency of our conversation. Is it to edification, according to what we would suppose from a company, who as William Penn remarks 'felt God present?' Are we not almost as outward in this respect as those who own no spirituality? Is not the pleasant remark, the amusing anecdote, as much regarded and sought after as among those who make no such pretensions as we do? Are the concerns of eternity ever on our lips? Do we ever venture to mention themes we expect to find sufficient to satisfy throughout all eternity? May we not speak of these things? Are the heart's cherished jewels to be locked up from very shame? Must we not be social when religion becomes the question? May subjects eliciting the powers of the understanding be continually our pride, and our soul's hope hidden? Oh! these questions may be answered in our sober and lonely moments, but they seem not befitting our drawing rooms. They are too impolite to be brought into notice there. 'Let all our meetings now be subservient to each other's good.'"

MEDIOCRITY.—Before I proceed to the next class of detractors, I beg leave to make a few remarks on some, who seem to have a family likeness to scorners and sneerers, by the frequent use of this phrase, "Oh! for my part, I like nothing but what is first-rate."

I never hear this expression without wondering, not only at the arrogant assumption of superior taste in the person speaking, but at their courage also in making such a conceited avowal; and when, for my own satisfaction, I have analyzed the talents of the parties, I have found these despisers of mediocrity were not much above mediocrity themselves; no wonder, for real talent is commonly indulgent.

But the declaration has excited my pity; for, as enjoyment is to be derived from every gradation of talent, ... these exclusive admirers of first-rates loose a considerable degree of innocent pleasure, by their superior refinement; and happy, on the contrary, are those who have an humble taste.—Amelia Opie.

Choosing One's Life Work.

The three most important choices men make in life are: First, the choice between the service of God and the service of sin; second, the choice of their partners in the marriage relation; and, third, the choice of their life work. To some things pertaining to this latter choice we desire at present to direct attention, writing particularly for the benefit of the young.

Most young people find the matter of deciding upon their life work a very perplexing one. Too often also because of their perplexity over this matter, and owing to a foolish diffidence about conversing with others on the subject, who might be of help to them, they come to no positive decision, but allow themselves to drift aimlessly on through life, doing whatever comes next to hand, and never directing their time and energy to the achievement of any great, dominating, noble and holy purpose. Such a course is lamentable in the extreme, and is as unwarrantable as it is lamentable. While there are ever likely to be perplexities attending the solution of so important a problem, yet those perplexities are never such that they cannot be resolved into clear and settled convictions of duty by one who is supremely desirous to know and accomplish the highest end of his being. This point, then, should be settled to begin with, namely, that God has a plan for the life of every intelligent being, and that plan may be known in advance by each individual, so far as relates to the special work in life which is most consonant with it. It may, and doubtless will, require some patient waiting on the Lord for light and guidance in most instances. It will also generally require much careful thought and study as to what one's talents and tastes seem best to qualify him for, what the providences connected with his life seem to indicate, and what are the permanent convictions and leadings of the Holy Spirit in each particular case. But to him that waits and seeks aright to know what his life work should be, the matter will at last be made perfectly plain. "If thine eye be single thy whole body shall be full of light." God has said, "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths."

This brings us to the point of noting the importance of beginning the religious life before attempting to settle the question of one's life work. Whatever determination one renders as to the vocation or profession he will follow, before he has settled it to make the will of God the supreme rule in all the affairs of his life, he is more than likely to decide from selfish and worldly considerations, and so to decide that, if converted to God later, his whole course will have to be altered, or else, if saved at all, he will be at best a marred vessel in the hands of the potter.

Thousands of men and women converted in middle life are constantly embarrassed in their life work and hindered more or less, religiously, by the inextricable complications into which they have been led through deciding upon their life work before entering the Christian life. Young people should be admonished by this to settle the greatest of all questions, that of beginning of the Christian life, before deciding upon those other questions which are ever likely to be settled wrongly, unless decided from a religious point of view. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," and only in the light of this wisdom are we likely to settle the great and important problems of life aright.

Having settled it to let religion be the guide of life, the will of God, which is the groundwork of all true religion, must become the supreme and invariable rule by which to determine every question brought before us of a character involving choice and volition on our part. He who wisely chooses his life work, therefore, will choose, not with reference to what will be most lucrative, most conducive to worldly honor, or most likely to secure any particular temporal advantage for himself and those dependent on him, but with supreme reference to the will of God concerning him. Every young person desirous of choosing aright in this important matter should devoutly pray, like Saul of Tarsus when convinced that Jesus was the Christ, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" determined to subordinate every other interest and consideration to the accomplishment of God's will as made known to and concerning him. In this spirit alone are we at all likely to choose that which will best enable us to achieve any end worthy the devotement of a life-time thereto.

In the matter of deciding upon God's will concerning our life-work, however, there are other subordinate things which generally need to be considered. Of course one may have an extraordinary Divine call to some special work in life, which always goes far to relieve the necessity of long considering these subordinate matters. Many are thus called to the work of the Christian ministry, and from the moment of receiving "the heavenly vision," are made, like St. Paul, to feel "necessity is upon me; yea, woe is me if I preach not the Gospel." Ordinarily, however, we have to settle the matter of our life work without any special divine revelation determining it for us, though not without Divine guidance through more ordinary means. Hence it becomes proper, in weighing the question to consider all matters bearing upon its proper solution. Among these are the study of one's natural tastes, talents and aptitudes, or what he seems, by natural endowments, to be best fitted for. The question of acquired ability, as due to education, training, environment, etc., may also properly be taken into the account. It would be absurd for one whose acquired abilities qualify him for serving in a higher sphere, in which he could do vastly more for humanity, to devote his life to ditch-digging or hod-carrying, though both are honorable kinds of service. One's providential relations and circumstances have also to be considered. Duty never calls two ways at once. Another question to be considered is, will the course of life contemplated, so far as all natural indications seem to point, be one in which my efforts will be likely to accomplish more for the cause of God and humanity than any other? These are some of the numerous subordinate matters to be considered in determining upon what our life work shall be.

In settling this important matter, too, we should seek constant counsel from God's Wo as also from those among God's people among our instructors in school and chu who, by reason of age, experience and wisdo are competent to give us helpful advice.

We do not hesitate to express the opini before concluding, that every Christian ou to feel that he is divinely called to the line service he pursues in life. If one is to foll law or medicine, let it be because he feels sured, "This is the will of God concerni me." If another is to conduct a farm, a st or a manufacturing business, let him do because assured that God calls him to that p ticular work. If another decides upon tea ing or devoting himself to literature, let it in the confidence that such is God's plan c cerning him, and such the field in which he most effectually serve God and his fellow-m

Some one on reading the foregoing pa graph, will desire to ask if we believe a m must be divinely called to these vocations same as one must be divinely called to the m istry. To this our reply is, we believe t every Christian man should be as fully c vinced that God wants him in the calling pursues as the divinely called preacher of Gospel is of his call to the ministry. We wo distinguish, however, between the extraor nary Divine call which usually designates m for the ministry, and God's ordinary method illuminating and directing his children as their life work. Still, we contend that, thou called by the ordinary means, every Christia conviction concerning this matter should u mately be as clear and imperative as is that the one who, by an extraordinary call, is into the work of the ministry.—Free Method

"THE INDWELLING PRESENCE."—The cent power of the Christian religion is the presen of God. All other religions have taught t the Creator is far away from his world. T message of God to the Jews was, "I will leave thee." The message of Christ was, "I am with you alway." And Jesus teaches how all pervading this presence is. God s the little sparrows fall. He clothes the gr of the field. He counts the hairs of our he And the Apostles, following Him, tell us t God is in the world reconciling it: that He i us as a hope of glory, and that He dwells in hearts. I am near to my Father, touched by Him at ev point, loved by Him, filled with his power, t to live becomes a joy, and the future is su "I shall be like Him."

Sometimes people think such an express as "the indwelling Christ" to be a mere fig of speech. It is impossible, they say. And they speak of one man being inspired by other. The spirit of Raphael entered into pupils. Now, if one man can so fill anot with his spirit, his love, his ideals, that he is itated almost instinctively by his pupil, can God fill us with Himself so that we shall beco his followers? It becomes all the more reas able when we remember that God is perfe that He is a spirit, and possesses powers which we humans are ignorant. Accordingly it was tted for examination to the J. B. Lippincott any, a few days before the recent conflagra- tion, which so largely destroyed their building and property. It was naturally occasion of serious anxiety to President Sharpless and to many interested in his work, whether his manuscript had escaped the flames. The opening of the fire-proof vaults has led to the recovery of his sheets in a safe condition, and to gratitude that thus three years' diligent labor of the author has not been lost.

In an editorial note in our present number, President Sharpless calls our attention to another history of Pennsylvania, by Dr. A. S. Bolles, two volumes of which have been recently published. This extensive work is in no sense a rival of Isaac Sharpless's, which is prepared for students in higher schools and in colleges, and as a convenient, one-volume book for general reading and reference. He and Dr. Bolles have been harmonious workers and mutual helpers in the same field.

HADDONFIELD QUARTERLY MEETING.—Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting was held at Moorestown, N. J., on the 14th instant, in the large new meeting-house, which was almost completely filled. The delightful weather helped some strangers to attend, whose company was most acceptable.

The meeting soon settled into a solemn silence, which before long was broken by a Friend who tenderly referred to the great love of God, as exemplified in the death of his Son; and at the same time the dangers of lightly esteeming this love were brought to our view.

Another Friend then spoke, enlarging on the same subject, depicting the results of living near to our Lord and encouraging all to maintain a love for each other and for the church. By this time the assembly was remarkably baptized into the one Holy Spirit, which only can be the strength and crown of our religious meetings. Other exercises followed, in which brethren and sisters were led feelingly to plead with all for a greater loyalty to Jesus Christ and a fuller submission to his sweet and easy yoke. The first meeting did not conclude until over two and one-half hours from its commencement. Young and old alike felt the deep solemnity of the occasion. The time seemed to pass swiftly; and it was a hushed congregation knit together into one body of love, which quietly and reverently proceeded to the business of the meeting.

The first three subjects in the meeting for business were considered in joint session. Our friend Levi R. Cowperthwaite returned a minute granted him one year ago to labor in Iowa. Sickness had prevented his accomplishing all he had originally in prospect. But the relation of his experiences to the crowded meeting was particularly instructive, and brought over us a feeling of much love for him, and a new appreciation of the limits and intents of our Master in sending forth or restraining his ministers.

The Atlantic City meeting was then considered. It was shown by the report of the committee having it in charge, that that valuable meeting had been held to the comfort and help of many Friends, including many others not of our Society. It was especially large during the summer months, when that popular resort was filled with visitors.

The Merchantville meeting next claimed our attention. The committee having oversight of it, had been discouraged by the attendance not being as large as a year or so ago. But after a kindly discussion and the exhibition of some variety of thought, it was finally decided that the Quarterly Meeting could not assume the responsibility of withdrawing its aid from the little band of people who weekly assemble in that town to worship in our simple way.

The shutters were then closed, and the other business proceeded with. The Queries revealed a generally satisfactory condition. Love exists in our borders. Our meetings are attended by most of our membership, except that a considerable number neglect those held in the middle of the week. This fact induced loving exhortation that Friends adhere to Fifth-day morning worship. One visiting Friend stated that such a condition was analagous to what he had recently read, that "Empty pews and cold hearts went along together."

The meeting concluded at almost three o'clock, with prayer, and with thanksgiving for the spiritual blessings of the day. Friends separated, feeling the occasion had been most comforting and stimulating to all. The aged, along with the young children, had been perceptibly tendered together and rejoiced in the presence of the Lord. It had been like one of those remarkable meetings of which we read about in the early days of our Society. It was a renewed evidence that God still visits his people. It afresh indicated that humbly to meet, expecting Christ to be with us, can be rewarded with a powerful baptism of the Holy Spirit, and thus help to cheer the participants in the heavenly way.

Notes from Others.

A MAN-WORKED MINISTRY.—If his work be in a city church it is a grave question whether any minister can now discharge it with efficiency who is much above fifty years of age. The multitude of details in a city parish, the excitement of the life, the severe demand upon the mind, and the heavy burden of responsibility call for a man in the prime of life, with an alert intellect and an unfailing body. —"Ian Maclaren."

WOMEN WHO DIVE FOR A LIVING.—Over one hundred Japanese women following the hazardous profession of divers are found along the coast of the peninsula. They are divided into four batches, and their age ranges from seventeen to thirty. They come almost exclusively from Shima, Miye ken, a noted fishery centre in Japan. Their earnings are of course not uniform, as they are paid according to the amount of their work, which consists in diving for agar agar seaweed, sea-ear, sea-cucumber, etc.—Japan News.

Clifford and Sarah Cress, a young married couple of the persuasion of the "River Brethren" Mennonites, whom we saw last spring about starting for religious labor among the natives of Africa, wrote on Tenth Month 19th from Bulawayo, South Africa, that the war would cause the following ordinary prices to double or treble in the next ninety days: eggs being then one dollar and twenty cents a dozen; potatoes, three dollars a bushel; graham flour, three dollars a bushel, and corn meal, four dollars a hundred weight.

CHURCHES IN SUMMER.—The time is rapidly coming when American Protestants will have to call a halt to the custom of closing town churches in the summer. The cessation of church work in the summer is accountable for a very large proportion of the neglect of the Sabbath among Christian people. You cannot intermit public worship for two months and then sustain it with enthusiasm the rest of the year. The number of people who go out of town in the summer is grossly exaggerated, and those who do go are not all away at the same time.—Watchman.

Correspondence.

I am sometimes asked to explain our position on various points. Sometimes it seems easy to do so; but again some one will become excited and personal, and I find the spirit of controversy creeping in, and sometimes find it safer, to leave the matter, lest more harm than good be done.

It does seem so dreadfully hard to get away from the ecclesiastical training which poisons—if I may use the expression—our minds from infancy, causing us to see truth not with naked vision, but through the glasses of some creed, council, or synod. The majority of us do not dare to face the truth. To dodge it, circumvent it, smother it, we are ready; but to face it, never. For when truth is faced, all our religious illusions vanish, and, oh! how sad that is to many, illusions are dearer than the real Christ, and the shadow counts for more than the enduring substance!

I was greatly struck with the extract from Eliza H. Varney's letter, as published in the issue of Twelfth Month 2nd. And yet, in spite of these and many other instances of a similar character, the majority of Christian professors seem content to rest entirely for their guidance on human reason; holding the day of prophecy forever past, all inspiration forever ceased. Is it because we find satisfaction in resting upon the lower plane, or do we fear lest, stepping higher, we should receive a command to do something which we do not wish to do; or is our spiritual blindness so dense that we can not, will not see and accept the plain teachings of Scripture and of experience?

Logs and timbers are readily identified there as having come from Japan, China, India and other parts of Asia, as well as from California, Washington and other parts of the American Continent. There are fine logs of the camphor tree, the mahogany, the redwood and the pine in this driftage. The British War Offices has received despatches from General Buller, telling of a serious reverse in Natal Colony, near Colenso, on his advance to the relief of Ladysmith, in a battle with General Joubert's forces, on the 14th inst.

General Buller was attempting to cross the Tugela River when he met the Boers. Finding it impossible to effect his object, he ordered a retirement in order to avoid greater losses. He left eleven guns behind. The fight lasted eight hours, and the British losses are placed at 1150. The city of London has been in a state of panic.

The London War Office says General White made a sortie from Ladysmith, captured a howitzer and drove off the Boers. On returning the troops had a fight with the burghers, but forced their way through with the bayonet. The Boer losses "were considerable," and the British had twelve killed, forty-three wounded, and 6 were taken prisoners.

General Buller has been superseded, and Lord Roberts is to conduct the African campaign, with General Kitchener as chief of staff.

Word was received on the 18th inst. that General Buller's forces are said to have forced a passage of the Tugela River, in Natal Colony, and "stiff fighting" followed, but the details of the conflict are not given. om the Christian Community of the Univer-Brotherhood.

eace and Blessing of God to you, very dear never to be forgotten in our souls, brothers sisters in Christ, of the Christian Com-ity. We don't know all your names, but we our dear brothers Joseph Elkinton and am Evans to transmit our love and our best tings to all our brothers. We greet you our fraternal kiss, and embrace you from ur hearts. We are very sorry that we are with you, but for the spirit there are no iers. We can live separately and in the t we will be united, what is said from both will be the Christian love, and where is Christian love, there is God himself.

r the love towards the brothers there is o large space. Neither large countries nor ns can separate the spirit of the brothers, h have Christian love between themselves; such love all is near enough, and all is ient. The people who have the Christian do not care for their own needs only, they care for their brothers,—clothing, feeding consoling them. We see such a Christian from you towards us in this so difficult a for us, of persecution and immigration into w country. You have made our brothers happy, and a few days ago we received you clothing, flour, oats, soap, wool, milk he children, beans, peas, sugar, tea, etc. have divided all with the South Colony. North Colony received the third part of goods you have sent. The goods we have dy distributed to our brothers.

e have received before many things from and all our brothers and sisters, our child-and old people, thank you from all their hearts, all your brothers and sisters. God bless you in this life and in the future, that you do not forget your suffering brothers; our Lord will not forget you too, in the time when you will need. You benefact not to the people only, but to the Lord himself; for who loves his brother, loves God too, and who hates his brother, hates God and his law, and persecutes the people having faith in God, and torments them, and keeps them in prison. But there are some kind brothers too, which do all their best to make their brothers free, to let them see their suffering families, and these brothers are assisting others in every need.

Dear brothers, how are you, how keeps your life in our Lord, these days?

We communicate to you that we are now pretty well, thank God. We do not lose courage after our suffering, we hope always for the grace from God.

We greet you once more, dear brothers and sisters, with our fraternal kiss, and send you our best salutations.

From the brothers and sisters of the Christian Community of the Universal Brotherhood.

An Aspect of the Pastoral System.

BY AGNES L. TIERNEY.

In the current number of the Atlantic Monthly is an article entitled: "Wanted, a Chair of Tent-Making," which opens thus: "The modern divinity school is not up to date. It is out of step with the age. It is still teaching theology, Hebrew, and Greek, church history, homiletics, elocution, and here and there sociology. Strangely enough, it overlooks the most conspicuous and most urgent demand of our time. What is needed is a brand-new chair: call it a Chair of Tent-Making, for that is Pauline."

From this point the author proceeds to show that because of the unrest and the critical spirit of the age, short pastorates are the rule. Three years is given as the average term of a pastorate in some of the leading denominations. Statistics follow showing a surprising decrease in the percentage of students entering the theological schools of the leading colleges. This reason for the decline is given: "At the points of adjustment of demand and supply between church and pastor, the economy of great denominations is breaking down. Under present conditions, no young man should enter the ministry of these communions without possessing some secular trade which will support him when he gets beyond mid-life. Paul knew the art of tent-making, and worked at his trade with an enviable sense of independence when the heathen people would have none of him. But to day I note: (1) that few men enter the theological seminary with a secular trade; (2) that none learn such there; (3) that multitudes of theological students, within twenty years, will have need of the trade which they have no chance to acquire."

Two reasons are given for the early withdrawal of minister from their chosen profession. First, that a minister who is "without charge," no matter to what high ideals he may have sacrificed his pulpit, finds the fact of his being temporarily out of a place an almost certain barrier to his election elsewhere. By reason of this attitude "many men stay on till the pastoral relation becomes sorely strained, till congregations are decimated, membership disintegrated and faction rife."

The second reason put forth is the almost universal demand for young ministers. "Experience, elsewhere the indispensable qualification, is in the ministry fast becoming a disqualification to any position of large influence."

After presenting typical cases and results where these conditions existed, the author closes with a statement and a question: "Thus, at the end of the century, there is an ominous combination of causes working to the weakening of the moral fibre of the ministry and to the deterioration of the highest of callings. At the same time all the standards of the church are being brought low. What can be done? Is the Chair of Tent-making inevitable, or can the Christian ministry yet be made a vocation for life?"

There is food for thought for all church-members in the half-dozen pages of this article. To the Society of Friends its consideration may be of special significance.

Some discussion is going at present among Friends as to whether or not a free ministry is a vital element in our worship. In many places, this foundation principle has already been abandoned. A prominent English Friend writes in a recent paper: "For want of proper nourishment the ideal of the free ministry is perishing before our eyes." In view of the statements in the suggestive article under consideration, it would seem that this ought rather to be a time when Friends should be more zealous than ever in upholding their cherished ideal.

Aside from our scruples on spiritual grounds against an appointed head of the church, there seem to be clear reasons why the turning of Friends to church forms may be fraught with danger and loss not only to themselves but to the rest of the world.

We do not need to be reminded that there are, and always have been, in every church, ministers of the highest integrity, fearless in the performance of duty, and faithful to the highest ideals of their calling. But it is a lamentable fact that wherever questions of morality, justice, and righteousness in public affairs have arisen, the great majority of ministers have not only failed to take the right side, but have been some of the most active and bitter opponents of reform. This tendency to time-serving may be partially accounted for by the uncertainty of their tenure of office and of the "keen competitive contest among rival candidates for a pulpit." If it is true as our author says, that "the strongest men in the ministry are often—yes, generally—the weakest candidates" because they are quiet and reserved in manner, homely in feature, awkward in gesture and with a manhood that revolts against the humiliation of a competitive contest for a pulpit—if this is true, it is no wonder that many fail in time of trial or that a successful candidate "knowing that his time is brief is sorely tempted to turn his energies toward the production of showy results and thus to attract the attention of the pulpit committees."

The demand for youth as a principal qualification for the paid ministry is another evidence of its danger. Young Friends may be impatient at times of what seems to them conservatism and lack of ardent enthusiasm in the elderly ministers. But they cannot measure the value of the influence exerted by the utterances, no matter how old-fashioned in phraseology, of those who

> "On with toil of heart and knees and hand
> Through the long gorge to the far light have won > Their path upward, and prevailed."

In the churches the young minister, by virtue of his prominent position "appeals to the hero-worshipping side of human nature to a far greater degree than do his elders." The elder men, "by knowledge chastened, by experience taught," fail to supply the craving for the picturesque and the romantic which often enters into the emotional side of religious life. From this evil the simplicity of the service, the directness of the message and the humility of the "chosen vessel of the Lord," have mercifully preserved the Society of Friends where they have kept pure the sacrificial flame of an inspired ministry.

Aside from these aspects of the question, it must be plain to every woman in the Society of Friends that with the advent of the paid minister, she is giving up her birthright of spiritual equality. It is true that in some meetings where the old order has been superseded, the pastor is a woman, but this does not adjust the balance. True spiritual equality can exist only where liberty of vocal service is guarded by both men and women. That hero-worship and unwholesome sentimentalism which hinders the spiritual growth of the recipient and weakens the religious life of the congregation, will not enter to any serious extent where women are regarded equally with men the interpreters of the "truth that shines on every heart."

If the free ministry is perishing from our midst, it is well to ask ourselves whether it is the fault of the system or of the individuals that make up the meetings.

There have been complaints that the utterances of the younger members of the Society are not well received by their elders who are sometimes grieved by what seems to them lack of depth and experience in their deliverances. And among both older and younger members in some places there is a distrust of the expression of honest conviction where such expression is not exactly in accord with tradition. Open-mindedness, a greater effort toward mutual understanding, and a broader sympathy should banish these difficulties. The crown of ripe experience and fuller knowledge can be freely granted to the older Friends while to the younger ones can be extended a deeper sympathy in their desire to be of some service in the meetings for worship.

It may be that at times the words of young Friends go beyond their actual experience in religious things. The growth of spiritual life in the soul is by development, and it is to be supposed that the joy and pain and trial that come with years will strengthen the fortresses of the spirit. But the young may have their share of these vicissitudes, for not all can rely upon "the genial sense of youth" alone, to keep them in the way of duty. Time will bring maturity, and a sympathetic attitude now, may save our meetings from a final loss of the ancient safeguard of a free ministry.

It is true that other causes are at work which may be far more disastrous to our usefulness in the future than a conservative censorship of the ministry. The Society of Friends has come to be synonymous with prosperity and ease. Its young people are growing up to know only one side of life—the pleasant and attractive. All material and educational advantages come to them without their own efforts. Is it to be expected that hearts that feel constrained to render thanks for material benefits chiefly, shall be the ones to seize upon new aspects of religious thought; and from the vantage-ground of real, practical, personal experience, in the deep things of the spirit, lead others to the higher life? The record of all history is against this hope.

It would be difficult for any of us to prescribe for this condition. Certainly the abolition of a free ministry and with it the degree of responsibilty which now rests upon the church at large would not suggest itself as a remedy.

SELECTED.

As It Seems to Some Others.

W. W. McKinney, editor of The Presbyterian, lately read a paper upon "Effective Preaching." The following points were presented and developed: To secure effective preaching one must fully and constantly recognize his calling and office. He is not his own master. He is the servant of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is first, a redeemed man; then a herald of God. He is commissioned to do a specific work. He is first and last merely the instrument through whom God and Christ and the Holy Ghost operate for human redemption. It is largely when a minister forgets or overlooks this guiding and regulative consideration that he becomes a mere human investigator, pursuing his own bent of mind, purpose of heart and habit of life, and declining more and more as a God force. He selects his own themes, and treats them in a manner that savors more of man than of God. He is simply the echo of theological "fads," or the philosophy in which he has been trained, or of the school of thought and culture which he has adopted, or the times in which he lives.

The preaching which is most effective in God's sight, and for attaining the objects which He has in view, is not that which deals with scientific, social and philosophical problems, with scholarly and erudite questions, or with critical theories, or with popular subjects, but that which pertains to the conscience, the heart and the life. As a rule there are specialists who can handle far better than the ordinary minister the themes that are more in their line and are able to treat them in all their diversified ramifications. Here and there may be found an exceptional preacher, who can touch up them to acceptance and profit, or, as the emergent occasion may demand, but generally they require too much time and investigation for the busy pastor to discuss with intelligence, discrimination and success. Besides, their discussion better becomes the platform, the press or the lyceum. Moreover, it must be remembered that our Lord has commissioned his servants to preach the Gospel, which all men need, and which alone satisfies soul hunger and revolutionizes society.

Again, the preaching which is most effective has a "Thus saith the Lord" back of it, as through it. This it was that made the Apostles and Reformers so successful. This is what is greatly needed in many modern pulpits. A distinctly Bible or divinely authoritative preaching is on the decline in various quarters. Too little appeal is made directly and positively to the Holy Oracles. Topics are selected too often from the newspaper, the magazine, the quarterly or the literary treatise, and great names are paraded in substantiation of what is advanced. Thus there is a divided authority where there should be only one Master, to whom the whole nation bows.

To increase effectiveness preaching should be full of Christ. For effective preaching the Holy Ghost power is a prime necessity. It must come with his demonstration. He must animate and apply it. The human element must be subordinate to the divine.

To be permanently effective, preaching must have as its structural basis wholesome doctrine. The modern cry—don't preach doctrine—is a false and misleading one. It has no support in the Bible, nor in philosophy, nor in reason.

The preacher, therefore, who would count on character-building and in soul-saving work can not afford to minimize, ignore or compromise Bible doctrine. He, of all men, should have the briefest, but the largest, creed, or a creed commensurate with time and eternity.

Considering our representative character under existing conditions, he becomes an effective preacher who is true to his denomination, spirit, standards and life.

WHAT REPENTANCE IS.—A class was once asked, what was meant by the word repentance. A little boy raised his hand.

"Well, what is it, my lad?"

"Being sorry for your sins," was the answer.

A little girl on the back seat raised her hand.

"Well, my little girl, what do you think?"

"I think," said the child, "it's being sorry enough to quit."

That is just where so many people fail. They are sorry enough at the time, but not sorry enough to quit.—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Some Account of John and Mary Hampton.

"Here I have to admire the goodness and condescending love and mercy of my great Redeemer, who followed me, watched over me, and kept me from utter ruin. For when temptations or desires arose in me to use the plural language, and the compliments, as Sir, Mr., etc., there was a secret something, that with a very few exceptions, kept me from the use of such language; also from reading pernicious books; phrenology particularly, which I was tempted to read, but was so condemned that I read little of it: and my heart commemorates his goodness in thus preserving me, and in again giving me those living foretastes of heavenly joy.

For we cannot cause these heavenly visitations, these feelings of Divine love, any more than we can cause the outward rain to descend. I feel that I am poor and weak, and have often times to endure leanness and poverty of soul, and some times seeming desertion; but at other times I have known what it is to abound; my heart, being contrited within me, and my cup filled with joy and rejoicing; and I can feelingly say, 'Thou, oh Lord, hast been good to me. I will praise and exalt thy name forever.' In these seasons (of favor) my children have been brought before the view of my mind, and I have fervently craved that they, one and all, may be favored ones, and close in with the offers of redeeming love and mercy. I have some times thought if children knew the great concern and anxiety that a parent feels for them, they would harldly adorn themselves, and their tender offering, in the manner some do. Yea, and I have mourned over the members of our once highly favored Society, having to fear that many do not appreciate the privileges they enjoy, or the testimonies that our forefathers suffered so much to promulgate.

"Surely the time will come when the Righteous Judge will separate the precious from the vile, "as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left; then shall He say unto them on his right hand, 'come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world,' but will say to them on the left, 'depart from me all ye workers of iniquity, I know you not." Solemn and awful consideration! It seems to me that it ought to arouse every one to look well to their situation, and through the help of a gracious God, endeavor to make their peace, while time and opportunity are afforded, in order that they may enjoy true peace while here and be prepared for the solemn change that will sooner or later come upon us all."

Thus closes the narration of his life work, as he has left it to us. And finding an address written to Friends at ———, Iowa, Third Mo., 1858, it is thought that extracts from it will not be out of place here. They are as follows:

"In the feeling of that love that wishes well to the whole human family, I feel constrained to write unto you, earnestly craving for you, as for myself, that we may be preserved, built up, and established on that Rock, which will be a safe hiding place to flee unto, . . . when the world, with all its allurements, will be as nothing to us. . . . . I have been led to believe that there are some amongst you who can, at times and at seasons, adopt the language of one formerly, "My soul doth magnify the Lord and my spirit doth rejoice in God, my Saviour," and in tender solicitude for these may say, hold on your way; keep to that you have attained; and above all press on for an enlargement in these feelings, and for greater dedication of heart; yea, and strengthen ye the brethren.

"Oh, it is as we abide under his teaching, that true peace and Divine comfort and consolation are felt and enjoyed, which are to the enlightened mind of more real worth than all the pleasures of the world. . . . As there is this abiding under these feelings, how guarded we will be in our behavior, our conversation, our dress, and the adorning of our children, those precious lambs committed to our care. Ah, methinks, a great responsibility rests on parents in the training of their children; not only in giving the right precept and example, but also in dressing them as simply as we would like to see them dressed in maturer years.

"And whilst my mind has been, as it were, prostrated before the throne of Grace, for the encouragement, the enlargement and the preservation of these, I have been led to take a view of some . . . that do not feel as much of the constraining love of the Prince of Peace. Oh, Friends, remember that we have but a short time to live in this world, that a never-ending eternity awaits us, and as our faith and works are, so shall our portion be. Awful consideration for one soul to be taken off in an unprepared state! The present time only is ours! My feelings have been aroused for you, and the prayer of my soul has been poured forth in your behalf.

"O, dear Friends, remember that it was said in old times that the offering should be clean and without blemish, which command is as binding on us at the present day as ever it was. Then how can we present ourselves acceptably before the Lord, twice in the week, if the cares and concerns of this world are in our hearts and on our tongues, until the very moment we enter the door where worship is to be performed?" . . . . To the young people he said:

"Some of you have felt convictions at times when none but the Lord knew your thoughts. Oh, let me, as a brother that craves your eternal good, plead with you to attend to these feelings, love and cherish them, for they will lead you on, even to that peace which the world cannot give, neither can it take it away.

"Finally, dear Friends, my heart's desire for you is, that you may be like a united band, ... that each one may feel the arising of that life that maketh glad the whole heart, and giveth evidence that when done with time here, you may be prepared to inherit that Kingdom which the Lord the Righteous Judge will give to those who confess Him before men, and really love his appearing; for such will He own before his father and the holy angels."

Among grand-father's writings, we find quite a number of entries kept entirely separate from his diary of daily events, chronicle of weather, etc., which he had kept for years. And as these contain many lively expressions, showing the living concern he felt not only for himself, but for the brotherhood, we give most of them here, with occasional extracts from letters written at different times; and also a few extracts from letters written by his wife, Mary Hampton.

During the last ten years of his life he wrote but little, and when he did, so low was his opinion of his ability to write anything that would be of benefit to others, that he frequently destroyed letters, etc., without sending them to the ones for whom they were intended. His diary begins:

"Eighth Month 15th, 1860.—At meeting. Favored with a little of that life and peace that was soul-solacing.

"Sixth Month 12th, 1861.—It was in my heart this evening to utter this language: 'Goodness and mercy, and truth, have followed me all the days of my life,' and my soul adores and magnifies that Being who still regards the frail creature that I am. . . I can do no good of myself, yet, through his condescending goodness, He can and does, at times, fill my heart with love wherein praises ascend to Him who is forever worthy.

"Fifth Month, 1862.—(On hearing an aged Friend say, 'If I only knew I was right, I wouldn't care what people said about me.') . . . . . When the great Creator formed man, he breathed into him the breath of life; and he became a living soul; and as he was in the image of his Creator he was capable of enjoying union and communion with Him, his great parent. He knew the voice of God, and when God spoke to him there was an unmistakable evidence from whence it came; and man knew, of a certainty knew, what was right; and although he fell, and, (for a time), lost this knowledge of good, yet God, who made him, had pity on him, and through adorable and unmerited mercy, cast up a way, and provided a means, through the mediation of the everlasting Covenant whereby he came again to know the voice of God.

"And I believe from the creation of man, down to the present time, men and women have been raised up, who have known the saving power of the blessed Redeemer, and recognized his inspeaking voice, and have felt an evidence of the truth of what they have said and handed down to us.

"Now the Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save; but He does dispense an unmistaken evidence that they are right, to those who really love his appearances, having Him uppermost in all their doings, and continually before their eyes; walking in his fear, and bringing all their deeds to the light. Yes, even in this day when miracles and prophecies have apparently ceased, man is just as much the object of redeeming love, as in any day, or age of the world; and if we are left destitute, and without an evidence of right and wrong, the fault is all our own.

"Divine justice is clear; for a way is cast up, a means is provided, and they that hunger and thirst after righteousness shall be filled. 'The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men.' Therefore if we give Him our whole heart He will give us the peaceful evidence of knowing his will. Then, oh, the joy and consolation we may feel, my pen cannot express!

"Second Month 28th, 1864.— . . Not a day and hardly an hour passes but I think how soon I must leave all things here below. And my fervent desires are put that I may be prepared for the great change and that I may be happy, eternally happy!

"Last day of 1866.—Oh, what changes have taken place within one year! Peace and plenty, health and prosperity, abound in this part of our land. . . .

"Oh, time! How swiftly it flies! To look back, how short the time seems since we were married; and yet almost thirty-seven years have passed; . . We have raised eight children, now all married but two. Thus our family consists of only four, and we enjoy ourselves very well. Surely blessings have been dispensed to us all our days."

(To be continued.)

KID-GLOVE AND COAL-OIL MEN. — Frank Thomson, the President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, who died a few weeks ago, was known as one of the foremost of living railway managers. There was no part of the business with which he was not familiar, from the control of its great moneyed interests to the fitting of a screw into an engine.

A wealthy man once brought his son to him, saying, "My son has gone through college. Can you make a place for him where he will succeed?"

Thomson was silent a moment, and then said: "That depends on whether he wants to take a kid-glove course or a coal-oil course."

"What do you mean?"

"If he takes a kid-glove course, he goes in as a clerk, to perform a certain amount daily of writing, for which he will be paid a salary. In the other course he goes into the shops, and learns the whole business, from the lowest drudgery up. When he has finished, he will know his trade, a valuable one, but his hands will be stained with coal-oil."

Frank Thomson himself, when a boy, chose the "coal-oil course." He worked four years in the car shops at Altoona, barely earning his living, but learning the mechanical details of the business.—Leader.

ONLY A PIN.—An overseer in a calico mill found a pin which cost the company nearly one hundred pounds. How could that be? Well, calicoes, after they are printed and washed and dried, are smoothed by being passed over heated rollers. By some mischance a pin dropped so as to lie upon the principal roller, and, indeed, become wedged into it, the head standing out a little from the surface. Over and over went the roller, and round went the calico, winding upon another roller, until the piece was measured off. Then another began to be dried and wound, and so on, till a hundred pieces had been counted off. When they came to be examined, it was found there were holes in every piece, and only three-quarters of a yard apart. Of course, the goods could not be sold now as perfect, but only as remnants, at about half the price they would have brought had it not been for that single pin. So it is with the power of an evil habit. That pin damaged forty hundred yards of new print, and a single vicious indulgence may blight a human life.—Selected.

It may, in connection, be interesting to view the history of these Indians.

The Delawares are said to have numbered at time of William Penn about six thousand. 'No other tribe on the continent," says orge Catlin, in his notes, 1844–48, "have n so much moved and jostled about by civ- ed invasions, and none have retreated as far, ought their way so desperately, as they have orably and bravely contended for every t of the ground they have passed over. From banks of the Delaware to the lovely Sus- hanna, and my native valley, and to the e and over the Allegheny Mountains, to Ohio River, to the Illinois and the Missis- pi, and at last to the west of the Mis- ri, they have been moved by treaties af- treaties with the government, who have r assigned to the mere handful of them t are left, a tract of land, as has been done a en times before, in fee simple, forever. In ry move the poor fellows have made they have n thrust, against their wills, from the graves heir fathers and their children, and plant- as they now are, on the borders of new ene- s, where their first occupation has been to e up their weapons in self-defense, and fight the ground they have been planted on. There o tribe, perhaps, amongst which greater more continued exertions have been made their conversion to Christianity—and that since the zealous efforts of the Moravian sionaries, who first began with them, nor any ngst whom those pious and zealous efforts e been squandered more in vain, which has, obably, been owing to the bad faith with h they have so often and so continually n treated by white people which have ex- l prejudices which have stood in the way heir mental improvement."

n the banks of the Muskingum the Dela- es lived in comparative tranquillity for a few rs, but during the Revolutionary war they e induced to take part with the British. a Heckewelder, in his history of the Indian ons, who once inhabited Pennsylvania, and neighboring States, says of them:

t was not the fault of the American govern- t, who were truly desirous of seeing the In- s adopt a neutral line of conduct, and re- edly advised them not to interfere in the rel between the colonies and the mother utry; happy would it have been had the ish government acted in the same manner, they pursued a different plan. These poor ded people were dragged into a war in h they had no concern, by which their pop- on was not only greatly reduced, but they the desire of becoming a civilized people; he Americans, at last, becoming exasper- t against them, and considering all Indians heir enemies, they sent parties out from to time to destroy them. The murder of Christian Indians on the Muskingum, in 2, completed their alienation. Those who remained were driven to despair and finally ersed."

heir subsequent history to 1877 is thus ed by W. H. Jackson:

In 1818 the Delawares ceded all their land hio to the government, and removed to the te River, Missouri, to the number of eigh- teen hundred, leaving a small number in Ohio. Another change followed eleven years after, (1829), when one thousand settled, by treaty, on the Kansas and Missouri Rivers, the rest going south to Red River.

"In 1866 they sold their land to the railroad which ran across it, and buying land from the Cherokees, settled where the main body now resides, merging with the Cherokees, small bands being scattered about among the Wichitas and Kiowas

"In 1866, by a special treaty they received and divided the funds held for their benefit, took lands in severalty, and ceased to be regarded as a tribe. They have given up their Indian ways and live in comfortable houses. Many of them are efficient farmers and good citizens. They are becoming so incorporated with other tribes that there has been no late enumeration of them made as a whole."

The census returns for 1890 mention ninety-five Delaware Indians as belonging to the Kiowa, Comanche and Wichita Agency, in the Indian Territory.

There are, however, two bodies of them located in Canada, one of which is on the Carodoc Reservation, located in Ontario, Canada, about fifty miles east of Detroit. This Reservation is a tract about twelve miles square, and has upon it a settlement of perhaps one hundred and forty Delawares, a large number of Chippewa Indians, and some Oneidas, in all a community numbering several hundred. The Delaware settlement is known as Munceytown, and the Indians themselves are Munceys, a name which spelled sometimes Munceys and Minsies, is said to be derived from the word Minisink, an island, applicable probably to one of their homes in former years.

Although many generations have passed away since the visits of William Penn to these shores, yet the memory of his character, and of his kindness to their ancestors is still cherished by these people, and one of their number who visited Philadelphia, within the past ten years, an educated man, named Nellis F. Timothy, stated that he well remembered the narration of events in their history by aged men among them in their assemblies, while he was quite a lad, in which the actions of this, their friend, still known among them as Miquon, (a feather), were spoken of and commended.

Another company of Delawares, about three hundred in number, is located at Moraviantown, about forty miles westward from the Carodoc Reserve, in Canada, and is largely composed of that portion of the tribe, who continue in association with or under the care of the Moravians.

In 1874, our late friend, Thomas C. Battey, was present at a Council with Kiowa and Commanche Indians, at their agency, when Captain Black Beaver, a Delaware, addressing those Indians, said:

"The Quakers are your friends; their father made a treaty with the Indians more than two hundred years ago, in which both parties had bound themselves, and their children after them, to be friends to each other forever. His words were: 'While sun and moon shall endure, grass grow, and water run.'

"This treaty has never been broken; the Indians have never taken any Quaker's blood, and the Quakers have always been true friends to the Indians. I am not telling you this from heresay; though this treaty was made so long ago, a copy of it has been kept by my people—my own eyes have seen it and my own hands have held it.'"

Afterwards in conversation with Thomas C. Battey he informed him that when William Penn gave this treaty to the Delawares "he told them to keep it for their children who should live after them." They accordingly placed it in the hands of their principal chief, for its preservation. Other treaties as they were made were deposited with him, but this he kept separate and distinct from the others. When this chief died these documents were taken care of by his successor. Afterwards when other treaties were made, as this Treaty of Peace and Friendship, made with William Penn, concerned several tribes, they, in a general council, selected a person to have especial care of this first, or, as they called it, "Great Treaty."

"On his death another was chosen, and so it continued to be preserved for many years by persons selected in a general council. Eventually, as the different tribes became scattered, the Delawares retained posession of it, and it was preserved by them as it had been before, the tribes in council making choice of a reliable person to take care of it. As time passed on and the tribe was removed westward, this copy fell into his hands, and he had it in his possession until the breaking out of the civil war." During this war his home was destroyed and the "Penn Parchmeut" so long and so carefully preserved by the Delawares was burned. [See THE FRIEND, Vol. lxx. p. 222.]

In a work published by our late friend Geo. W. Brown, of Philadelphia, in 1882, entitled "Historical Sketches chiefly relating to the early settlement of Friends at Falls, in Bucks Co., Pa.," some interesting traditions are recalled which have been preserved of the relations of William Penn to the Indians during his residence in this country. He remarks:

"The Indians bore frequent testimony that William Penn had never deceived them, and unbounded was their confidence in his integrity; doubtless it was good policy in him to cultivate their friendship; but apart from every temporal consideration, they possessed a large share of his sympathy, brotherly kindness and disinterested love.

"There is something truly pleasing in looking back to the beginnings and advances, the manifestations, comforts, and good fruits of the friendship which continued to subsist between William Penn and the Indians. Although he possessed the land which had descended to them from their fathers, and they were exiles from it, still that friendship remained unimpaired. Were we now to look abroad over the scattered remnants of our Indian population, how few examples of warm attachment, unwavering friendship, and bursts of affection would be manifested at the presence of those who have been instrumental in dispossessing them of their ancient inheritance, and how few would be the testimonials to the justice and generosity of these.

"The burst of affection with which the poor Indians sometimes greeted their friend William Penn were somewhat singular in exhibition, and, although doubtless annoying, perhaps were not altogether displeasing to his generous feelings. If tradition truly represents, these warm-hearted creatures upon one occasion met him on the road, in the neighborhood of Pennsbury, riding in his coach, and from the impulse of the moment, drew him from it, and wrapped their blankets around him in token of affection; and so impetuous was their zeal to manifest friendship and attachment, that all danger from the fright of horses was unheeded, overlooked, or not comprehended, and it was needful for the driver to tie them to trees for safety.

"As the personal presence of William Penn among the poor Indians was marked by many testimonials of affection on their part, and as their friendship was pure, it was deeply rooted and lasting, time and distance did not wear it out; the memory thereof was precious to them, and they exhibited evidence of it long after William Penn had passed away. It appears they had a veneration for Pennsbury on account of associations connected with it, and some tribes were wont to perform annual visits to the locality. These visits were continued until late in the last century, and perhaps were continued until a later period of time. An eye witness, who had been a young girl residing with the family occupying the brew house dwelling about the time to which reference has been made, represented that among the annual visitors were some of great age; and at that time there yet remained some of the walnut trees that William Penn had planted, and these were objects to which they clung with howling and lamentation, apparently frantic with grief, yet with wild enthusiastic fondness. Some of these aged children of the forest had knowledge of William Penn personally as well as from tradition, and there must have been something touching in these exhibitions of true hearted affection for his memory, which still remained so fresh and lively, so long after his earthly pilgrimage had ended." INSIGNIFICANT WORK. — Big men do big things, but how many big things are big failures. The biggest ship that ever was built was no profit to anybody until it was sold and broken up for old junk. Many a little ship during the same time had made good voyages, and brought profit to its owner. A man writes a big book; he is a great man, but few people ever read his book, yet it is learned and bulky, and perpetuates the man's fame through generations. Another man writes a little letter, a pamphlet, an epistle, which can be read in an hour, carried in the pocket, copied in a little while, sent through the mails, or printed on a few pages, and that little pamphlet is translated into hundreds of languages, scattered by millions in every quarter of the globe.

Paul, chained to a soldier in his hired house at Rome, wrote no big books. A dozen pages would contain the largest treatise he ever wrote, and yet the thoughts there embodied, and the truths there declared, live through all ages, and go to the ends of the earth. A seed is a little thing, but in it there is the promise of a waving harvest through all the years to come. A granite monument is a great thing, but it has no advancement, no promise, no growth.

Let the man who does little things wait on God, who can make little things great, and accomplish his own purpose of grace and goodness, working wonders by means of the feeblest instruments through his matchless wisdom and his powerful love.—Christian.

SAY well is good—do well is better.

PUT UP THE SWORD.

I have sung of the soldier's glory
As I never shall sing again;
I have gazed on the shambles gory,
I have smelled of the slaughter pen.

There is blood in the ink-well clotted,
There are stains on the laurel leaf,
And the pages of fame are blotted
With tears of a needless grief.

The bird is slaughtered for fashion,
And the beast is killed for sport;
And never the word compassion
Is whispered at Moloch's court.

For the parent seal in the water
Is slain and her child must die,
That some sister or wife or daughter
Her beauty may beautify.

And the merciful thought we smother—
For such is the way of man—
As we murder the useless mother
For the "unborn astrakhan."

But a season of rest comes never
For the rarest sport of all;
Will His patience endure forever,
Who noteth a sparrow's fall?

When the volleys of hell are sweeping
The sea and the battle plain,
Do you think that our God is sleeping,
And never to wake again?

When hunger and ravenous fever
Are slaying the wasted frame,
Shall we worship the red deceiver.
The devil that men call Fame?

We may swing the censer to cover
The odor of blood—in vain;
God asks us, over and over,
"Where is thy brother, Cain!"

AT THE HEART.—In Baltimore one First-day morning, as the people were going to church, a telegraph pole, large and strong and round, looking as stalwart as any other in line, suddenly did a very strange thing. It never would have been heard of except for the queer happening. Suddenly, without any warning, like a great, strong man struck down by an unseen bullet, the pole groaned, and then, with a snapping, tearing, grinding sound, the upper portion fell to the street, leaving about twenty-five feet standing. The people looked on and wondered. A crowd soon gathered, marvelling at what should have caused such a catastrophe. There was no hurricane, not even a brisk breeze, and surely not enough to sever such a pole as that, which had weathered so many storms. Just then a small boy began to climb the stump that was left to investigate. When he reached the top he found that right where the pole had broken was a scooped-out place where a pair of woodpeckers had cut out their nest, and there in the nest was a poor little woodpecker, frightened half to death Unnoticed, but steadily, stroke after stroke, the birds had dug their way back to the heart of that great, strong telegraph pole until they had sapped its strength. Sometimes a man comes crashing down in the city. His outer life has seemed strong and round and respectable. People have believed in him and trusted him, but he suddenly comes down in his ruin. The whole world marvels at it; but after a little it is discovered that some secret sin had eaten into his heart, and the strength of the man's life was gone, though he looked to the world as strong as ever. Look out for the secret sin.—L. A. Banks.

Our Meek and Lowly Example.

A contrast may be profitable for all to s what example Jesus has left for us in t many perplexed vicissitudes of life. "For when ye do well and suffer for it, ye take

The Book of Job and the Larger Life.

Out of this baleful doctrine of Retribution, as the Jews held it, there came to the writer of the book of Job the blessed theory that suffering and sorrow have, somewhere in the recesses of the Divine mind, other end than what men call punishment. He looked forth with open eyes, and saw that life and thought were large enough to include possibilities quite beyond the vision of most of his contemporaries.

Since his day—although we have slowly apprehended the truth that there are those among us who have become impatient—we have realized that the life within us is so much larger, so much more crowded with meaning, that it includes a growing belief that pain is even purgatorial—that it is blessed of God who gives it and to man who receives it. Nor are we yet fully understanding this mystery of suffering, but our eyes are being opened to two facts: the marvellous efficacy for mankind of the sufferings of Christ, and the hitherto unthought-of-offerings of God.

It is sometimes asked: Where in the Old Testament is set forth the fatherhood of God? The answer is, that while there is no treatise upon this subject in the books, they are full of the assumption that God is the father of spirits—full of such manifestations as are, for love, mercy, and disciplinary care, infinitely beyond all earthly fatherliness. And that assumption is nowhere more apparent than in the book of Job. The writer's meaning is clear. God is Job's father. Amidst storm and whirlwind, desertion, bodily pain, and sorrow of soul, he not only preserves his integrity, but he keeps his hold upon God as a child clings to a loving but chastening father. And this other thought is growing, and will carry with it comfort as well as explanation of many dark dispensations, viz: that God is father in the sense, that He not only sorrows over us, rejoices with us, but that He also suffers with us.

Dimly enough this idea came to the early thinkers and sufferers. To the psalmist and the prophets it had greater and fuller meaning. "As a father pitieth his children." It is difficult to keep out of the word pity something very like fellow-suffering. "In all their affliction He was afflicted." Surely that means something more than poetry.

The light thus thrown upon the sacrifice of Jesus is wonderful. If the best of all souls, the absolutely guileless one, could break his heart upon the Mount in order that we might learn what love means, and that we might also learn to suffer, as He did, in other's stead, shall not God, who created man in his own image, whose hourly concern is man's welfare, who feels the throb of every human heart, and is acquainted with every writhing of pain, shall He not also be moved not only to pity but to such a quality of sympathy as shall make Him to suffer with us, to be afflicted in our affliction?

Ever remembering, however, that this fellow-suffering of God is not suffering in the sense of physical pain. That comes for our soul's education and training, and God has no such need. But there is the suffering of sympathy, and he who doubts the sympathetic love of God has forgotten the messages of the prophets, the songs of psalmists, and the teachings of the Christ. Life, in view of such a belief, puts on new aspects, new attractions, is full of new delights.

In all our afflictions He is afflicted, so that pain becomes sanctified—sorrow is divine—the wail of earthly woe finds a response in Heaven. The fevered hand stretched out in helplessness touches the hand of God, and feels a thrill of Divine sympathy. There is no despairing man or woman in the world but may know that God is touched with a feeling of our infirmities. The theme promises to be one for angels—this idea of suffering—with God suffering with us; Jesus suffering with us. Man suffering not for himself only, but for his fellow-man. God and man united in one great work of redemption.

How rich in spiritual results a consideration of this subject may be. Jesus is the highest manifestation of God in all that pertains to humanity. God in Christ, and Christ in God. If one can suffer, is there any difficulty in conceiving that the other can? Man, who is in Christ, as Christ is in God, may and does suffer in the place of others. We bear pain in order that others may endure it. We die that others may learn to give up life. We die also as our Master did, that others may be saved to live. Job does not lie in the dust for nothing. He suffered in order that the world in after ages may learn to suffer and be strong. Even as Jesus died that we might live, so have countless men and women taught posterity how to bless the hand of the Lord when it has been heavy upon them.—Charles Sharp in Friends Quarterly Examiner.

MAKE up your mind to do your best work for God, and to give Him your best years. You make a mistake if you suppose that warped timber and broken brick-bats are good enough to build into his spiritual temple.—To-day.

Items Concerning the Society.

Friends' Library on Sixteenth Street has added an improved fireproof stack to the Record room for the accommodation of old records.

Ever since the attempt to introduce a paid pastor into Boston meeting, the members who were distinctly inclined to Friends' principles have been exercised under sore discouragement, and the whole innovation has had naturally a disuniting effect. At length a committee appointed to take into view the situation is said to have reported in favor of a return towards our fundamental principles in regard to ministry, and recommended the discontinuance of the pastor who had for some two years been employed. Visiting ministers have now more freedom there in the exercise of their apprehended gifts.

A letter from Benjamin P. Brown reports that he finished his service in Iowa on the 6th instant, having been there nearly two months, visiting all the Meetings of Iowa Yearly Meeting and Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting and most of the families, also quite a number of families not of our religious Society, but inclined towards Friends. He also felt drawn to hold quite a number of meetings with the "liberal Friends" and other denominations, where he found a great openness. These meetings were turned over to be held as Friends' meetings. "A great hungering and thirsting after a closer walk with God" was witnessed, and to become better acquainted with Friends' doctrines.

Coming through Indiana he held a few meetings—one at Sugar Grove, one at Danville, and one at Indianapolis, and reached Barnesville, Ohio, on the 12th, where he has been holding meetings and visiting families up to the 17th instant, intending to proceed towards home in North Carolina in a few days.

We are glad to hear that the distinguished author of "Verbum Dei" [Robert F. Horton, M. A., of Oxford, England, the teaching of whose work was given in THE FRIEND, Vol. 69, Nos. 43-46], has relinquished the title of "Rev." before his name. The more ministers of the gospel can let men see that they are men with men, and that whatever respect is paid to them is not on account of their position in the church, but because they are intrinsically worthy of respect, and for their work's sake, the better it will be for the cause of Christ. The title "Rev." makes a man professional if he accepts it, and separates him artificially from his fellows, in the same way that a clerical dress does, or preaching in a gown. All such artificial separations may minister to the pride of the flesh, may even be defended on the ground of ecclesiastical order, but seems to us not in accordance with the simplicity of Christ.—The Interchange.

Notes from Others.

FACTS ABOUT "THANKSGIVING."—The first recorded Thanksgiving was the old Hebrew feast of tabernacles. The first national English Thanksgiving was on Ninth Month 8th, 1588, for the defeat of the Spanish Armada. There have been but two English Thanksgvings in this century. One was on Second Month 27th, 1872, for the recovery of the Prince of Wales from illness; the other, Sixth Month 21st, 1887, for the Queen's Jubilee. The New England Thanksgiving dates from 1632 when the Massachusetts Bay Colony set apart a day for thanksgiving. The first national Thanksgiving proclamations were by Congress during the revolutionary war. The first great American Thanksgiving Day was in 1784, for the declaration of peace. There was one more national thanksgiving in 1789, and no other till 1863, when President Lincoln issued a national proclamation for a day of thanksgiving. Since that time the Presidents have issued annual proclamations.—Selected.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President, on the 20th inst., sent to the Senate the treaty negotiated at The Hague last Seventh Month for the pacific settlement of disputes between nations, and the declaration to prohibit for a term of five years the launching of explosives from balloons.

This year the United States will have exported about 200,000,000 of its wheat crop, about 80,000,000 of which will be in the form of flour.

The Danish West Indian Islands are for sale, an agent from St. Thomas being in Washington to ascertain if this country will buy them.

A wire-wound segmental gun has been made in Reading, Pa., and inspected by General Miles. It is a machine for coast defence that will hurl a 600 pound missile twelve miles. Our Government contemplates buying one hundred of these engines of destruction.

Admiral Dewey has renewed his request that the Chinese who served with him during the battle of Manila Bay be given the right to enter the United States free of restrictions. His letter has been forwarded to Congress.

Major General Henry W. Lawton was shot and killed on the morning of the 19th inst., in front of his troops while leading an attack on the Filipinos at San Mateo, northwest of Manila.

A Manila despatch says that Colonel Wilder has telegraphed from Bayombong that Aguinaldo has crossed the mountains near Bayombong, going southward. His wife died in a village in that vicinity.

General Young reports from Vigan that Colonels Hare and Howse are still in pursuit of the insurgent column beholding the American prisoners, being only one day behind. Four of the Americans have been released, but Lieutenant Gilmore is still a captive.

A new ingenious American device is the culture of rice in artificial swamps, the invention of some Northwestern farmers settled in Louisiana. They built a bank around a section of prairie and pumped water into the inclosure from artesian wells. When the crop matures the water is let out, the ground dried off and reapers and binders secure the harvest at greatly reduced cost. The land is easily prepared for the next season, and there is no danger from drouth.

A despatch from Aberdeen, S. D., dated Twelfth Month, 24th, says: During a high northwest wind a prairie fire that started east of Eureka has swept over the country, causing great destruction of hay and grass on the ranges. Many farmers, it is thought, have been entirely burned out. The fire was the most extensive for years, embracing a tract several miles wide and five miles long. Great anxiety is felt for the safety of people in the path of the fire.

Consul Sawter, of Glauchau, in a recent communication to the U. S. State Department, says: "Nettle fibre has of late come greatly into favor in the manufacture of fine yarns and tissues. In Germany, there are factories which use these fibres both in spinning and for ulterier purposes. In nettle spinning alone, over 10,000 spindles and some hundred workmen are employed. The raw material is imported almost exclusively from China, whence 3,000 4,000 double cwts. (672,000 to 896,000 pounds) are annually sent to Germany. Nettle fibre produces one of t finest tissues obtainable from any known kind of vegetab fibre. In view of the importance which this seems like to attain in connection with the weaving industries, it intended to introduce the cultivation of nettles, if po sible, into the Kameroons. The idea is to prepare t products of this experimental culture at the place whe they are obtained, and test them in German factori Should favorable results follow from these experiment it is intended to organize nettle growing enterprises on extensive scale."

ARNAL DEPENDENCE AND MORAL INDEPEN-CE.—The Church of Christ is never a bar ue public reform. For the spirit of Christ, out which no church is his (Rom. viii: 9), e leader of all righteous reform, and for purpose manifested—" to destroy the ks of the devil."

ıt the professing church is much complained s a time-server, and standing either as a ier or as non-committal against the crying rms of each generation. Thus many ad-ed espousers of noble causes are turned y from what they have been taught to re-l as " the Church " unto infidelity.

ne secret of the general backwardness of ıbsidized clergy, when standing as the tbpiece of their churches' conscience, is temptation thus laid for them to "draw r convictions and their salaries from the e source."

nce the above was penned, a flagrant illus-ion has come before the public view in es prepared by the poet-laureate of Eng- to inflame the war-spirit with words tend-to its deification. We have, as yet, seen omment on them; and we doubt not the oor's personal sincerity in thus expressing convictions. But the natural temptation poetic gift hired out for national uses, as spiritual gift for church uses, is to voice sentiment of employers as one's own—to n echo of prevailing thought rather than ıder in its reform.

o on both sides such a ministry has been , to preach each of two opposing warfares, as formerly in our own country on one l of State lines it was preaching for slavery, e on the other there were those who could ch for its abolition. The lesson to be ıed is, that we must generally look else-re for the advancing of reforms on earth, in the zeal of paid retainers.

ıt, however honestly induced, the service-ableness of the poet-laureate to minister to the popular breath, has educed from him a plan of salvation for soldiers to which, if we must date it as of the year 1900, we shall affix the letters B. C. rather than A. D.—a doctrine to be found indeed in Pagan classics, and later in Moslem fanaticism, but never in the teaching of Christ. For the trumpet of war gives his certain sound that Paganism is a military necessity, in these words: " Who dies for country sleeps in God!"

Such a doctrine, by those who adopt it, must be applied with at least equal force to Boer and Philippine defenders, as to British and American invaders; and to the immoral and sinners on both sides, as well as to professing Christians—a doctrine clearly not of the gospel of Him who said, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Yet are no exponents of opinion to be hired lest they become hirelings? Editors, teachers, lecturers, authors—is their work to go without wages, that their teachings may be a free ministry of a free conscience? All voices, indeed, in all departments are hireling, if their deliverances in matters of right and wrong are swayed by salaries, and proclaim instead of a masterful conscience, a conscience itself paymastered. An employed editor, for instance, is not an hireling because he at heart stands for the general concern for which his periodical was founded; but, because, should he have so fallen, he yields in fearfulness for his salary to a balking of the truth which he feels.

Intellectual labor and expression, where men are rightful employers of it, requires time for production which ought honestly to be paid for. But an anointed voice of Divine truth crying in the wilderness of this world's sin, belongs to a different kingdom than that of this world's wages. Constructions of our own powers require time and temporal compensation, whereas the deliverances of the quickening Spirit are of their own nature ex tempore. The Holy Ghost is their employer and producer, and pays in the coin of his own kingdom. Let not man degrade the gift to filthy lucre, else his words continue not as the preaching of the Word, but as lecturing in men's employ. Subject to temptation, though all salaried expression is, yet the voicing of the Holy Spirit deserves to stand removed as far beyond the taint of this as is possible; and whatever may be expected of lower and human engagements, those of "the bride, the Lamb's wife," should be preserved above suspicion.

PUBLIC AND HIDDEN EVANGELISTS.—"I see earth receding; heaven is opening; God is calling me," were recently the expiring words of Dwight L. Moody. And we trust the testimony was given, not for those at his bedside alone, but for that world-wide hearing which his remarkable public career will assure. At the same time among young men over the world will circulate the words uttered to his boys: "I have always been an ambitious man; not ambitious to lay up wealth, but to leave you work to do."

What the Holy Spirit will do in reclaiming men's lives through one dedicated instrument, however imperfect, stands forth as a loud encouragement to anyone for the same dedication. It is a testimony not to the methods used, but to the dedication, and, above all, to the grace which can run and be glorified, where men are its chosen instruments, only through such dedication in them. Any who would expect to reproduce the power manifest through Dwight L. Moody by reproducing his methods, may, perhaps, find one lesson in his own disappointment—that methods are not the power. The one thing needful is unquestioning dedication to the Divine will as manifest in every gift and opening of his Holy Spirit.

While we might have desired that D. L. Moody had been more of a George Fox, we could also desire that many of us, representing the more excellent way of truth handed down to us as successors of Fox, had been filled with all the dedication and power apparent in Moody. We believe that the possibilities of true revival at our hands, if we are faithful to the Spirit, are greater on the more spiritual lines of Fox than in the more mixed processes of modern evangelists. But whatever the methods, the lover of souls is not going to stop at every imperfection of his instruments, or every deficient opinion in their heads. He sees beyond these into the souls whom He would gather by his own power.

A surrendered heart and will in us is enough for Him to work with. It is well for a public example to be made of one such, here and there; but remarkable publicity is not the rule of grace, most of whose work is passing in hidden undercurrents of life, and has its hidden ministers, written in the Book of Life, though not in public print; contrite, praying and suffering,—but, hereafter, it may be, to appear as surprises in glory, with the voice of the Word, saying: "This poor widow hath cast in more than they all."

Wounded in the House of its Friends.

THE "seven thousand" in our land who have not bowed their knee to the Baal of imperial aggrandizement nor kissed his image, are mostly to be found among the more thoughtful, educated and truth-seeking minds. Seeing now that the sword is cutting at the root of our tree of state, such thinkers, for the sake of the fundamental principles of our republic, have been saying in varied forms: "Put up thy sword into its sheath, for they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." They would stop the war,—would even call it unchristian, for the sake of the State; we, the Friends, would do so to all war for the sake of Christ, and this would embrace a loyal concern for the State and all humanity. The others would be of a peace party, criticising a political administration. We would be of the Prince of Peace, condemning all war as of the administration of Satan from the beginning.

But the tiger of war in man, once savoring of the taste of human blood and dominion, is in no mood to discern aught else as patriotism, or to discriminate between the patriots of a Peace party and the patriots of the Peace principle. To this blindness the peace of Christ is all one with war on the administration. And the portion of the political peace-men who act apart from his wisdom and spirit have done much to place the Christian peace-lovers in the same light before the public eye, in which they themselves are viewed.

Thus it was in our civil war, when to be an espouser of Peace on any principle was enough to stigmatize one as "a copperhead,"—as professing peace out of sympathy with the enemy, or in hostility to the government, rather than from friendship with Christ. The same incapacity of discernment also in the Revolutionary war was not slow to class Friends as "tories." But the peace-makers who are to "be called the children of God" are on a foundation as radically different from a peace-party of political policy, as the spirit and love of Christ differs from expediency. Yet such as see only on the surface between the two, see but the one thing which both desire in common,—namely the ceasing of a war. But the weapons of our warfare for peace are not carnal, nor is war to be fought down in its own spirit. The peace-makers who are in the spirit of Christ cannot become a party to the propaganda of a peace party when conducted, as has seemed to be much the case, on methods of irritation, vituperation, hostility to an administration, the prejudicing of soldiers in Manila or elsewhere by tracts appealing to other motives than the gospel ground of peace, and by methods coming so close to popular ideas of treason or disloyalty, as to place the Christian disciples of peace under the same ban with the political fomenters of dissatisfaction.

So these have, in part, been closing up the way of our religious Society in its further efforts to plead with the nation against the alarming progress of militarism. Various Yearly Meetings of Friends were faithful to testify against the first resort to a war which has opened flood-gates of evils present and to come. And while the Society still stands ready and of good courage to avail itself of right openings to appeal to the nation, yet it finds the cause of Peace at present largely prejudiced by the wound which it has received in the house of its injudicious friends.

Funerals.

We get an occasional good article on the popular sin of extravagance, so common at funerals, in preparing a sumptuous feast at the house of mourning, to be eaten on the return from burial. Such articles are timely and in place. We should have more of them on the sin of sumptuousness, especially at funerals. The time-honored custom of blending the house of mourning and the house of feasting, merits a sharp reproof and the disapprobation of all intelligent, and especially Christian people. The former will come to all in due time, and will do us good, as the heart is made better.—Eccl. vii: 3. The latter is of doubtful propriety.

A frugal meal for those who come a distance, and others who have performed the necessary labor, is perfectly right; but sumptuousness is wrong at any time, and nowhere more unbecoming than at a funeral.

But why criticise the practice of feasting at the house of mourning, and pass unnoticed the expensive and vain display secured at the undertaker's?

The habiliments for clothing the body for burial, and the casket in which it is laid, often costs much more than a Christian burial would demand. While we insist on a respectable burial of the body, conducted with Christian decorum upon Gospel principles, we maintain that costly and vain display should be studiously avoided, and especially so when the life of the deceased was in harmony with the teachings of the Gospel and example of the meek and lowly Saviour. If the dead would be edified by employing any such doubtful measures, as expressive of honor or sympathy, we would see more propriety in doing so; and the same could be said of the costly monuments erected in many of our cemeteries. It is a practice common to this age, and still on the increase. That the resting place of our friends should be modestly marked, I presume, no one will deny. We consider it a duty; Christianity demands it. It is only the abuse, or excess of the practice that enters into this line of thought. That the present practice on this line results in evil, I think, will be admitted by all. Let us ask a few questions and see!

1. Is it consistent to place a stone or monument at the grave of a meek and lowly saint, costing from one hundred to one thousand dollars? Consistency is a jewel that belongs to Christianity, but is not found when thus exemplified.

2. Who is benefited by it intellectually, morally, or religiously? Not one. One class may be, somewhat, financially.

3. Whose money are we spending? The Lord's. We have none of our own; we are only stewards over that which He has given

4. Are we responsible for the use we ma of our money? We certainly must give an count of our stewardship, and the Lord wa all that we do not absolutely need, to forw his cause.

5. Does it damage any one? Yes, a g many financially; hence more or less mora and religiously.

6. How much are we using unnecessari This is hard to calculate, but nationally reaches the billions; as professors of religi millions; so far as it concerns us, and a church, or Brotherhood, multiplied thousan What will the judgment be? If the hungry not fed, the naked not clothed, and the p have not the Gospel preached to them with t money, will we do it, or will we continue waste? Which? "Wherefore do you sp money for that which is not bread?"—Isa. 2.—Enoch Eby in Gospel Messenger.

The Heresy of Self-Government by a Churc

(From article on "Erastianism" in the N teenth Century" for Sixth Mo., 1899, by J. Llewe Davies.)

To come, in conclusion, to the heart of matter. The idea of the church as holdin commission to carry on self-government commission entrusted by Christ to the hish as the representatives and appointed rulers the church, seems to apply a delegation of thority from one who is prevented by s cause from being himself present to use own authority. There is always someth suspicious, from the Christian point of vi in language which speaks of Christ as Founder of religion, who framed a constitu and left it behind Him. It is more Christ to think of Christ as the Prince of the king of heaven, as the living Head of the chu than as if he were a Solon or a Lycurgus. call of God to every generation of the chu is not that it should resolutely claim self-g ernment and self-judgment, but that it sho ask for faith to know itself to be governed judged by Christ. We are not to look back a deceased Founder, but up to a living L who is leading his church and his world wards. Ecclesiastical rule has been to us t large an extent a failure because ecclesias have been tempted to regard themselves ruling in the place of Christ. When we knowledge Christ as himself the living R and Judge of the Church and the world, are not tempted to take the godless view civil government, as if it were the functio some Cæsar whose province is distinct fr that of God. The commonwealths of the w are exalted into departments of the di kingdom; the sections of the church are perfect members, imperfect in various mann and degrees, of the body of Christ.

THE WISDOM OF CONDESCENSION.—The gr er thy consequence in the world, the less casion is there for thee to seek for honor yearn for approbation from thy fellow-man. is therefore the law of dignity as well as humility in all thy conversation to regard and every attainment as a source of respo bility rather than of merit. Pride is presum only because it is blind.

ixth Month 23rd, 1867.—"To-day a living cern arose in my heart whilst in meeting, so much on my own account, as of some of members on account of drowsiness and ap-ent indifference to the all-important work he salvation of the never-dying soul. Oh, sleeping in meetings! What a stumbling-k in the way of enquirers after Truth! And t hypocrisy for Friends together pretend-to worship; pretending to hold communion n God, and then fall asleep. Oh that our nbers might be more careful in this respect." 4th.—"Being about to leave home for quite ngth of time, a concern has rested on my d, to leave a few lines to you, my dear dren, whom I tenderly love, and for whom el concerned. I know that I am a poor ature; that I can do no good thing of my-, and that it is all in mercy, unmerited cy, that I am what I am. But I feel that who begat living desires in my heart, in my ng years, hath been round about me all my long, and praises be to his ever worthy ne, therefore, saith my soul; my concern is you, my dear children, next to my own l. And living desires have been raised in heart for you, that you may be more and e weaned from the fashions of the world; your affections more and more set on ven and heavenly things. For I do believe t some of you in an especial manner have n visited with the Dayspring from on high, have made covenant by some sacrifice ing that there is a peace which the world neither give nor take away. Oh, then, ivate those feelings; renew covenant with ovenant-keeping God, though it may be in cross; though it may make you appear , and the finger of scorn be pointed at you he worldly wise, heed it not, for they that not bear the cross cannot wear the crown. l what are a few days or years of warfare e to be compared to peace and happiness in ever-ending eternity to come? Oh then, entreated by a father that yearns for your twth and establishment in the ever-blessed th; be watchful, be sober, love the truth, o meetings; yea, and more often than the ning, have your minds turned to the great or of every good thing, unto Him who ds the thread of your lives, who can lengthen shorten as he pleases, and will, as you are hful unto manifested duty, give you soul-aining food, peace and quietness and as-ance forever."

enth Month 19th, 1869:

A thankful heart I feel;
In peace my mind is staid.*

* couplet that he very often inserted, sometimes along h margin of an entry or entries.

"It has been a very rainy, cloudy time lately, and many are very much discouraged; but no doubt these rains are for some good purpose and for my part I feel resigned, though as to the outward, things look gloomy; yet I think I but seldom, if ever, felt more of the spirit of thankfulness and praise than of late. 'Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it' (Malachai iii : 10).

"Oh, how true is this saying of the prophet! And how we may realize the same overflowing of Divine presence and favor, if we but bring all the tithes into the storehouse! Yea, and I have found by living experience that the more I give up of the world, and resign all into his hands, the more He makes my cup to overflow, and fills me with thanksgiving and praise to his ever adorable name. . . Oh thou who hast followed me all the days of my life, and often made my peace to flow, be with me to the end of my days."

First Month 16th, 1870.—"A ray of comfort this morning, after weeks of desertion and poverty. Oh these seasons of poverty! They are likely for my good, though trying and hard to endure. Often of late has the language of my heart been, 'Why am I thus forsaken? Wherein have I sinned?' Oh, it seems to me that there is great care needed, that in these seasons of proving we hold on, and continue to 'wrestle for the blessing,' that we take not our 'flight in the winter,' but wait in patience; for in his own time He will 'arise' [with healing in his wings.]"

"I charge you, oh ye daughters of Jerusalem by the roes and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up nor awake my beloved until he please."

Extracts from an address to his children, Fourth Month 27th, 1870:

"Dear Children:—I feel my own weakness and insufficiency, and that of myself I can do nothing; that it is only by the operation of the Holy Spirit that I can availingly put up my humble petition either for myself or for my children. Often in the watches of the night, when my head has been laid on my pillow, have you, my dear children, been brought before the view of my mind, and living desires have been raised for your growth and establishment in the ever blessed Truth. I believe that you all have felt something, at times, of a desire after that food that nourishes up the soul . . and have been invited to come, 'taste and see that the Lord is good,' . . and oh, I have desired for you, that you may not let these seasons pass unimproved, for they are the messages of love to your never-dying souls. Be not over much discouraged, or cast down in your minds, but every day think on these things, and renew covenant with a covenant-keeping God; and though you may at times feel destitute and forsaken and have to lament, and say as one formerly: 'Oh, my leanness, my leanness!' yet, as you abide in patience, in his own time He will arise for your help, . . and as the beauty of the sun in the firmament, when the thick clouds are dispelled, so will his presence be to you, even as a foretaste of heavenly joy. Therefore 'press forward toward the mark of the prize,' at the end of the race, when you may 'praise Him on the banks of deliverance.' . . Be entreated by one who craves your present and everlasting good, to take care of the talents committed to your care. Oh, I have desired that none of you may bury them in the earth. . . I am aware that there are many discouraging things, and besetting sins; the state of Society looks gloomy and we think we see things that are not exactly right in the conduct of those to whom we think we might hope to look for counsel and example; but is this any excuse for us.' 'What is that to thee; follow thou me,' is as applicable now as when uttered by the lips of Truth, and those we thus judge may be better than we think them to be. So I have craved for you, my dear children, that you be not cast down at the signs of the times, but go to meetings, and seek to be fed with crumbs from his bountiful table, and though you may at times feel nothing of the arising of that life, which is 'hid with Christ in God,' be not dismayed: 'Seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you?' As there is this looking unto Him in sincerity, in his own time He will arise and animate you with the flowings of his love, and you can go to your homes rejoicing. 'Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.'

"Finally, dear children, as I have been exercised for myself, knowing that according to the course of nature 'the earthly house of this tabernacle must soon be dissolved,' so have I been for you, believing that at least some of you must soon follow me to the silent tomb. And I have desired, that, as I near the solemn close, I may not have one pang on your account, fearing that any of you are following the road to ruin, but that I may have the comfortable hope that one and all, are pursuing the road to peace, and I hope that He who was my morning star may be my evening song. Oh, I have this testimony to leave, that there is more real comfort, more real enjoyment in this life, when the mind is staid on heaven and heavenly things than in all the world besides, and it is unto those who seek for glory, and eternal life, and continue in well doing to the end, that He will say, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.'"

Diary, Second Month 27th, 1871.—"During last fall and the early winter I think I never, to my remembrance, felt so much of thankfulness, gratitude and praise for so long a time together. The removal to the West of two of my daughters, one of whom was in declining health, has been a sore trial to me. The bereavement at times seemed almost more than human nature could bear, but being remarkably favored with reverence and love to Him who seeth not as man seeth, and whose ways are not as our ways, I was enabled to resign all into his hands who doeth all things well.

"But it seems that a clear sky and bright sunshine [spiritually], are not best for us at all times, neither are they at our command. For now, how changed! leanness and poverty are my portion. At meeting to-day, instead of stillness and comfort, unpleasant thoughts would intrude themselves, and I had no power to get rid of them. And these things have been cause of secret searching of heart and thinking, 'Where is the beloved gone? Why has He so withdrawn his presence from me? Have I been presumptuous, or unmindful of his favors? or why is it thus, with me. Tell me, oh thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest Thy flocks to rest at noon. Oh, come again to thy temple, and fill me again with thy love, for I desire to serve thee, oh Holy Father, be with me the few remaining days allotted me in this vale of tears. Be my comfort and my staff in the evening of my days. Oh, leave me not when my strength faileth. I feel destitute, yet I feel that thou hast been with me many a time; therefore in abasedness of self I prostrate myself before thee this evening, for thou alone canst raise and comfort me; for I know thy ways are pleasant and thy paths are peace.'"

Misquoted Lines.

It is a peculiar faculty of human memory to misquote proverbs and poetry, and almost invariably to place the credit where it does not belong. We give below a few familiar expressions that are generally misquoted:

Nine men out of ten think that "The Lord tempers the wind to the shorn lamb" is from the Bible, whereas Laurence Sterne is the author. "Pouring oil upon the troubled waters" is also ascribed to the sacred Scriptures, whereas it is not there; in fact, no one knows its origin.

Nothing is more common than to hear:

"A man convinced against his will Is of the same opinion still."

This is an impossible condition of mind, for no one can be convinced of one opinion, and at the same time hold to an opposite one.

What Butler wrote was eminently sensible:

"He that complies against his will
Is of his own opinion still."

A famous passage of Scripture is often misquoted thus: "He that is without sin among you let him cast the first stone." It should be, "Let him first cast a stone."

Sometimes we are told, "Behold how great a fire a little matter kindleth!" whereas James said, "Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth," which is quite a different thing. (James iii: 5.)

We also hear that a "miss is as good as a mile," which is not as sensible or forcible as the true proverb, "A miss of an inch is as good as a mile."

"Look before you leap," should be, "Look before you ere you leap."

Pope is generally credited with having written:

"Immodest words admit of no defense,
For want of decency is want of sense;"

though it would puzzle any one to find the verses in his writings. They were written by the Earl of Roscommon, who died before Pope was born.

Franklin said, "Honesty is the best policy," but the maxim is of Spanish origin, and may be found in "Don Quixote."

One who, receiving seed to sow, has at seed-time not sown it, inflicts loss upon his Master; although he has not lost the seed, yet there is a loss in proportion as their might have been gain if he had sown at the fit time.—Anon.

"I AM."

(Exodus iii: 14.)

When God would teach mankind his name,
He calls himself the great "I Am;"
And leaves a blank where Christians may Insert those things for which they pray.

The meaning is, as if he said,
"I Am" thy life, though thou be dead;
If thou art weak, thou needst not fear,
"I Am" thy help, and "I Am" near.

Dost thou because of sin repine?
"I Am" thy God, who saves from sin,
Although thy footsteps wandering rove,
Come, taste my mercy: "I Am" love.

If thou art dark, "I Am" thy light;
If thou art blind, "I Am" thy sight;
And when distressed, "I Am" indeed
A present help in time of need.

Art thou compelled to take the field
Against thy foes, "I Am" thy shield
And thine exceeding great reward;
Depend on me—"I Am" the Lord.

"I Am" to those who on me call
Their Lord, their Saviour, and their all,
Their consolation and their peace—
"I Am" the Lord their Righteousness.

Making the Best of His Situation.

Some years ago a young man was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to a term of five years in state prison for a crime of which he had no knowledge.

He was friendless, and had spent every dollar that he possessed in the world endeavoring to clear himself of the charge. In spite of this crushing misfortune, however, he resolved to make the best of his situation, and while serving his sentence, to prepare himself for the career which he had marked out prior to his arrest. While his fellow prisoners saw only a dreary point of waiting before them, he perceived an opportunity for self-advancement.

He was skilful in the use of cabinet-maker's tools, and though he was employed in the prison workshop ten hours a day, he managed to make, at odd times, miniature pieces of furniture which visitors to the prison eagerly purchased. Before he had been there a fortnight he had earned enough to buy a work on medicine.

With joy now he hailed the long evenings which were his own. While on every hand were men who were indulging in vile talk and plotting mischief, he was busy at his studies. Meanwhile he spent a little time each day in the making of children's toys, thus providing himself with what books and stationery he needed, besides sending, each month, a tidy little sum to the bank.

One after another the men who had served long and short sentences in the prison, some of them men of marked ability, were set free, and with hearts filled with bitterness, and minds full of evil designs, went back into the world. Finally the "student prisoner," as he was called, was set at liberty. Besides having a snug sum in the bank to his credit, he possessed a thorough book knowledge of medicine. At once he entered a medical college, and, at the expiration of two years, passed the State examinations with honor, and at once began to practice.

A physician whose practice was small, incensed because the young doctor was fast winning favor where he had failed, in some manner learned of the unfortunate circu stances which had darkened his early life, told the story from one end of the city to other. Suddenly the young physician fo his practice falling off, and scarce a mo had passed when he could count his patie upon his fingers.

But, meanwhile, certain facts had come light, proving conclusively that the yo doctor had no connection with the crime. C tain of those who had listened to the doct tale, made an investigation, and learning true facts of the case, there came a react The jealous physician lost his entire pract and borne onward by the flood-tide of popu feeling, the young doctor attained fame which he had never dreamed.

THE KILLING OF SYMPATHY BY FICTION DRAMA.—We avail ourselves of the follow extract from the Association News in sup of exercises to similar purport which have cently appeared in our columns:

these days of railroads and telegraphs he many other inventions of the past few which seem almost to have annihilated and time, we can hardly appreciate the tions to which our ancestors had to adapt selves even only one hundred years ago. ose times the bulk of the refined, intelli- people, were farmers. This was the na- result of the comparative newness of the ry. When the people first came here found a vast wilderness, and as soon as had built their houses, it was necessary em to provide something for their fami- o eat and to wear. Everything had to be factured from the raw material. Hence ne about that each home was a little world elf, in which all the arts were practised greater or less perfection. The father e family provided the material, and the er made it up. He raised most of ood for his family on his own farm, and a share of their clothes came from the source. The comforts of life were all e, even if there were not all the luxuries ave now. Many farmers find it hard to a living in these times, but they are not g to live in the simple style of their an- rs. Civilization has brought with it so conveniences that some of them are now dered necessities. But they cost money, money is hard for the farmers to obtain. hen his son became ready to work, he lly followed in his father's footsteps, and me a farmer. If not, there was the pos- ty of going to the city and finding employ- there. And there has been even more ge in the cities than in the country dis- s. Now there are large corporations into h he may go where he becomes merely one el in the large machine. But it is neces- that he be there to keep the whole going. e is tied fast, for the entire machine can- top while he is away. When our boy from farm came in to find employment in the he became the apprentice of some one e trade he wished to learn. The master- man was usually a friend of his father's, also, probably, a member of the Society of nds. It was a very important matter to the boy under someone whose example it d be well for him to follow. In the Yearly Meeting Minutes we find, "Advised that Friends be careful not to put their children apprentices to such as are not Friends, whereby they are often led away through evil example, but as much as in them lies, to bring up their children and all under their care in the fear and nurture of the Lord, that none may be blameworthy in a thing so greatly necessary." This advice later crystallized into the Query with which we are all acquainted. When the apprentice had acquired a requisite amount of proficiency he in turn became master. Here he also was at perfect freedom to go and come just as he chose. If he preferred to close his place of business at any time it affected only himself, and, possibly, his apprentices.

Not only were their business duties less confining than ours, but Friends of that time had such a strong testimony against places of diversion that there were few outside matters to take them from home. We find in the Yearly Meeting Minutes the following:

"One prevailing danger which attends them (the youth) is the frequenting of public companies, such as are too often met with in taverns, fairs and all places of public diversion, wherein, although they may see no harm at first, there is a snare in which many promising youth have been caught, having been overtaken in unguarded moments, not only with the current vanities, but even the infections of the wicked . . . . And as most disorders are more easily prevented than remedied, we advise Friends, in their Monthly Meetings, to take this matter under their care, and add their assistance to the endeavors of individuals, to discourage it as much as in them lies." As a result of this feeling in the Society, Friends had little to do with those distractions which now absorb the time of so many. In fact there were far fewer for anyone. Wm. Penn early laid a prohibition on all theatrical performances in his province "as tending to looseness and immorality," and the same feeling prevented many other things of a similar nature.

It must not be inferred, however, that there was no pleasant side to their life. Horses were plenty, and pride did not prevent anyone from having a drive on account of the appearance of his vehicle. When it came time to go to meeting they frequently went on horseback, and an English Friend, who was travelling in this country, remarks on the many horses standing on the space before the meeting-house at the close of meeting, some with carriages, but more than twice as many saddled. At other times the children were all tumbled into a hay-wagon. In the city they used these great old-fashioned affairs, with huge springs which we see now kept as reliques of the past. But for those who walked, the way was often long, and a lift was gratefully accepted. One Friend tells an interesting little story of Wm. Penn in ths connection: "When a little girl, she used to walk from Derby, where she resided, to Haverford meeting, the distance of a few miles. One day as she was walking along, she was overtaken by a Friend on horseback, who proved to be Wm. Penn. On coming up with her he inquired where she was going, and on her informing him, he, with his usually good nature, desired her to get up behind him, and, bringing his horse to a convenient place, she mounted, and so rode away upon bare-back. Being without shoes or stockings, her bare legs and feet dangling by the side of the governor's horse. Although Wm. Penn was at this time both governor and proprietor, he did not think it beneath him thus to help along a poor barefooted girl on her way to meeting, and, notwithstanding the maxims and customs of the world, these little kind offices to those in low station in life were so far from lowering him in the estimation of those he was appointed to govern, that there perhaps never was a governor who stood higher in the opinion of those governed by him, than Wm. Penn did."

A Recent Description of William Penn.—In the new Lippincott Magazine for Twelfth Month appears the following from the pen of William Perrine: "Penn arrived in the first week of December, 1699, after a three months' voyage in the Canterbury. Penn at this time was fifty-five years of age. He united in a marked degree the simple and amiable piety of the Quaker to the manners and accomplishments of a man of the world. His fine scholarship, his skill as a writer, his fluency as a speaker, his serenity of temper, his thoughtful courtesy, his broad-minded benevolence, his sense of justice, and his purity in private life, stamped him plainly as a man of superior breed. Physically strong, tall, well made, with fine dark eyes and a face in which the traces of his handsome youth had not yet been obliterated by portliness and advancing years, still so nimble and athletic that he would jump and run in the sports of his Indian friends, a sprightly and facetious talker, and fond of good company, he was one of the most gracious and attractive members of the sect whose cause he had long championed with heroic zeal. One day, when he was riding on horse back to Haverford, where he was wont to preach, he overtook a little girl from Darby who was going on foot to the same destination, and good naturedly allowed her to mount the horse's back and ride behind him. But in the privacy of his chamber this pleasant gentleman was the humblest of Christians. Thus, on another occasion, when he was lodging at a place in Gwynedd, a boy in the household was anxious to see the great man. He crept up to the room to which Penn had retired, peeped through the latchet hole, and there beheld him on his knees in prayer and in thanksgiving for his refuge in the wilderness."

"Servants of the Living God."—There is a story told by a man who, years ago, was taken captive in the Mediterranean by one of the corsairs which used to sweep those seas. He was sold as a slave, and endured the rigors of Mohammedan bondage. One day an Englishman came on board the vessel where he was, and talking with his owner, made a bargain for him, paid the price and bought the slave.

The poor captive bitterly reproached his purchaser. "You, a free born Englishman, buy me for a slave!"

But the purchaser said, "I have bought you to set you free." At once the captives sorrow was turned to joy and his reproach to gratitude; and falling at the feet of his new master, he said, "I will be your servant forever."

Thenceforth nothing was too hard for him to do for a master who had bought him with a price, that he might set him free. So Jesus has bought us, and so ought we to serve Him.—Ex.

One Boy's Debt to Child-Study.

Five years ago I was employed as principal of schools at this place. At the opening of school a little six-year-old boy came to school and was placed in the first primary. Complaints came to me during the year of the boy's stupidity; he apparently "could not learn," so his teacher said. I knew his parents were poor and ignorant, and I eased my conscience by telling his teacher "that where there is but little given, there's but little required;" and telling her to "do the best you can with him," I dismissed the whole affair from my mind.

When Archie's first year was ended, it was found by "examination" that he knew but little if anything more than he did when he started to school; so he was accordingly "booked" for the first primary, the second year. The second year rolled around and found Archie physically larger and stronger, but mentally weaker at the end of his school year. About this time poor Archie's father went insane and was taken to Kankakee. It may seem cruel to you, but we teachers felt gratified when Archie's father was taken to the asylum, for we felt that to a certain degree we had solved the problem of the boy's dulness.

But the third year a new factor entered into our problem. Archie's two younger brothers started into school, and of course were put in the same class with Archie, for he still was in the first primary. The third year passed away and Archie's two brothers did their work nicely and were to be promoted to the second primary, but poor Archie was in the same condition as at first, dull, careless, and we thought brainless. But feeling sorry for the poor boy and disliking to mortify him by promoting his younger brothers over him, I violated the iron-clad of "grades," "ex's," etc., and passed him along with his two brothers into the second primary. But the fourth year came and went and found Archie just as dumb apparently as ever; so, perforce, we had to start him in his fifth year in his "old second reader, again, and his teacher informed us that "he ought to be in his primer."

But by this time there had begun to creep into my brain some of the first faint rays of scientific child-study, and I said to myself, I will study Archie. One day I began to notice him—I had never seen him before. There he was, a boy eleven years old, sitting in his seat, idle, his under jaw hanging down, vacant-eyed, and that utterly expressionless face which we find in idiots. He seemed to take no interest in what was going on around him: when called upon to read, he had lost his place, and his teacher would scold him for his carelessness. The next morning I found Archie in one of the stores with some other children looking at Christmas toys displayed on every side. I began talking with him in regard to what he wanted Santa Claus to bring him; he bashfully pointed to a little "dumb watch." But, I said, "Archie, why not wish for a watch like mine that will tick loud and will run? Just listen now and hear my watch tick." I tested the little fellow's hearing in that way and found he could only hear my watch tick within three feet of either ear, while I could hear it easily at twenty feet. I then felt that I was getting hold of a clue, I took him up to my physician's office who examined him and found at the back of the nose the "adenoid growths" which had affected his hearing; in a moment he removed them, and the boy went back to school. The doctor and I told no one of what we had done, not even his parents or his teacher; in fact, I did not mention it in my home, for reasons which you will understand later. In about three weeks from the time the operation was performed, my little son, who is in the same class with Archie, said, at the dinner table, "Papa, you ought to see just how fast Archie is learning, he gets all the 'head-marks' in spelling and he is just beating us all in reading." Next his teacher came to me and said, "What have you done to Archie? His improvement is wonderful, he is the brightest one of his class.' I then told her what had been done for the poor little fellow whom we had abused and treated so, for almost five years.

At the close of this term's work, Archie stood at the head of a class of twenty-two, where for almost five years he had been at the foot. The "dunce-cap" worn by poor little Archie so long now rests in its proper place on my head. —E. H. Miller, in Child-Study Monthly.

Little Foxes.

Henry M. Stanley tells us that when he was passing through the forests of Africa, the most formidable foes he encountered, those that caused the greatest loss of life to his caravan, and came near defeating his expedition, were the Wambutti dwarfs. These diminutive men had only little bows and arrows for weapons, so small that they looked like children's playthings; but upon the tip of each tiny arrow was a drop of poison which would kill an elephant or a man as surely and quickly as a rifle. Their defence was through the dense forest, and, waiting in ambush, let fly their arrows before they could be discovered. They dug ditches and carefully covered them over with sticks and leaves. They fixed spikes in the ground and tipped them with poison. Into these ditches and on these spikes man and beast would fall or step to their death. One of the strangest things about it was that their poison was made of honey. It is thus that Satan wages his destructive warfare against God's people. Stealthily, under cover of darkness, by treachery, with weapons seemingly harmless, through the sweets of life, he comes clothed as "an angel of light." Yet how deadly are the little honey-coated sins which he administers, how sure the destruction of him who is deceived into wandering from the straight and narrow way.

What are some of these sins usually thought of as little sins? There are sins which by comparison with great sins men call little. Ill temper in family, commercial, and church relations; a light and frivolous spirit; remissness in religious duties; social whispering, slandering, and backbiting; vanity and folly in dress; indulgence in hurtful amusement; careless and impure conversation; pride, etc. There are a host of these "little foxes" we might easily find.

What is the harm they do? They injure our consciences by hardening them; they relax our devotion to and prevent our communion with God; they hinder the presence of Christ with us; they grieve the Holy Spirit; and especially they make way for greater sins.

How must little sins be dealt with? Not tenderly; not connivingly; but they must be "taken." We must take them or they will take us. We must watch against and pray against and fight against even the smallest of sins, or by and by we will be overcome of sin and fall into utter spiritual ruin. Look out for the little foxes that spoil the vines. Make no place in your life for so-called minor evils.—New York Observer.

THE RUSH OF MODERN TIMES. — The dir effect of the present driving rate at which lif is forced along is beginning to show itself i two important directions. First, while th average of life is longer because of the im proved condition of child life, the life of me and women, but especially men, is growin shorter. The pressure to go fast is makin men and women old before their time, and laying many of them in the grave. Good Joh Woolman, the American Quaker of last centur used to say that God never meant men to t and moil as they generally do for a living; a somehow we shall have to be brought to t conclusion 'that man shall not live by bre alone, but by every word that proceedeth o of the mouth of God.' This rush all day lon is not life. Second, with this rapidity of pa we are told that originality is becoming rar every year, and 'a casual type of mind' is bei developed. The pleasures of the mind a being sacrificed, notwithstanding the diffusi of a certain type of education. We are sta ing ourselves in order to live. The quieter a more meditative way suggested by Scriptu profits both soul and body.—The Christian.
